Mr. RAKER. Oh, let me answer that. If Congress should see its way clear to say that we will turn over to the municipalities the funds received from the sale of the land of these town sites, said fund to be conducted and directed and handled as the electorate of that municipality sees fit, then there would be a different question presented altogether. That is not before the House at the present time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The other question is in regard to the general town-site law. What were the provisions or what are the provisions of the general town-site law as to disposing of the proceeds of the sale of town lots?

Mr. RAKER. They are very voluminous. I have them here in the Revised Statutes. I do not care to go into the details of that.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Do not those proceeds go to the trustees or the county judge, to be disposed of for the benefit of the city?

Mr. RAKER. No. It was so arranged that there was just enough money raised to administer the law, to give each man a piece of property, a lot or a block in the town, and the towns were built up.

Mr. LAFFERTY. After that were not the remaining lots turned over to the municipality, to be sold for the benefit of the town?

Mr. RAKER. They provided homes for them.

Mr. LAFFERTY. As distinguished from the reclamation town-project work, where all the lots originally set apart to be sold by the Government must be sold by the Government.

Mr. RAKER. No; they provided that after the lots began to be sold and began to be more valuable because of the settlement of the town the price should be raised by appraisement; and a man went upon a particular tract of land and settled there and paid his $10 or $15, and that went into the fund which was for the purpose of administering the law. But that is not the question involved here. That matter I would discuss and go into very readily, but that is not the question involved here. In the first place, the gentleman will not be able to point out any place where the Government has been engaged in municipal improvements such as those named, and in every other conceivable municipal improvement that can be specified.

Let us see what is the argument made by the gentlemen who are in favor of the bill in regard to improvements. In the first place, it is provided in the Reclamation Service that these large tracts of land shall be set aside. Then there was a desire to reserve within the territory withdrawn or to be irrigated town sites, first, 160-acre tracts. One hundred and sixty acres, a man knows, 10 or 15 or 20 miles apart, is a large enough tract for any one town to start with to accommodate the needs and necessities of the reclamation project. Then a few years later they passed an act by which they gave the Secretary of the Interior the power to withdraw not to exceed 640 acres when he believed it was in the interest of public economy or in the general public interest. Has there been a statement made before the committee or before the House that has shown that they could not sell these lots if they subdivided the tracts and offered them for sale? Has there been a statement by any gentleman in favor of this bill to-day that the 160-acre tract was laid off as it ought to have been in building up a town in a community of that kind? The law provides that there should be parks; that there should be public squares; that there should be reserved a certain amount for schoolhouses; and all other matters that might go to beautify that town and never sold so long as they were used for those purposes. Has any of these been thus laid off and the balance of the lots offered for sale at an appraiser's price, so that the people might come in and build up those towns? No. What has been the result? They have gone into the center of the 640-acre tract, contrary to the building up of every other town or the making of any public improvements, and have not laid out any location for a schoolhouse or a public park, and have not been able to say to those who purchased, "When you come here and buy you will know there will be a schoolhouse at this place; that there will be a town hall over here eventually when this municipality gets sufficiently upon its feet; and there will be another public park over here and a boulevard down here." They go right into the center and lay off a tract of 10 acres. Stop and think what that means.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman state that, as a matter of fact, to the extent they lay off these tracts at all, they do not make provision for these public squares and for the purposes to which he refers?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman I will do the best I can. I asked the gentleman from South Dakota what was done, and I understood from him that they laid off the 10-acre tracts and made no other provisions. I understood the same from the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Not at all. It has been the custom all along to lay off a public square and a place for a schoolhouse.

Mr. RAKER. Within the 10 acres?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. That will be all right; yes. You gentlemen who have grown up with the West know what it is in regard to the building up of a town, in regard to where you locate your schoolhouse or your courthouse and where you would build up your stores and make your other improvements. We have laid off here a 10-acre tract, and no more, and we have offered it for sale.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. As I understand the trend of the gentleman's argument, it is to the effect that if the Reclamation Service would pursue a proper policy of administration—that is to say, lay off the entire number of town lots and dispose of them at once—there would be no need for giving to the municipality one-half of the receipts from the sale of the town lots, for the reason that all the lots will become privately owned and subject to taxation.

Mr. RAKER. In whole or in part.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I wish to say that I agree with the gentleman to that extent, but they are refusing to do that.

Mr. RAKER. I am coming to that in a moment. Now, gentlemen, here are 10 acres in the center of this particular tract laid off and sold. Who is going to determine the next 10 acres to be subdivided and laid off, and the next 10 acres?

The rest of it is all public domain surrounding the town, and after the four tracts are laid off in 10 acres each, or 40 acres, you are going off at the other end to lay off another tract, and how are you going to sell your lots consistently when you have your park and schoolhouses and other improvements over here a quarter of a mile, contrary to the building of every town in the country?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman or not, but I am assuming that these town sites are of 640 acres.

Mr. RAKER. Some of them are 160 acres and some 640 acres.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, the gentleman says that all that is laid off for public purposes is 10 acres?

Mr. RAKER. No. I was just referring to the town site at Newell, as referred to by the gentleman who preceded me, that they first laid off 10 acres and then another 10 acres.

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to get at is this: Assuming a town site to be 640 acres, and some of the blocks in the town site were to be used for public purposes, does the gentleman believe that in advance, before any lots are sold, all proposed public developments should be laid out and reserved and that everything in the nature of a public park or a schoolhouse square or a public square of any kind should be developed in the first instance, or should it be developed as the city, or village, or whatever it might be, was developed?

Mr. RAKER. That is just what I am coming to. In the first place, there should be a plan and the city should be marked out with boulevards, if you are pleased so to call them, with streets, alleys, and parks and other public places. And then when you offer your lots for sale you know exactly where in the future is going to be your schoolhouse and where is going to be your courthouse and other public reserves in the town.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman now what the policy is which is pursued in connection with the laying out of these town sites?

Mr. RAKER. I do not know exactly, but what I have read in the bill, and have heard from gentlemen in favor of the bill, and that is, that they lay out 10 or 20 acres and sell that and no more.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is a member of the committee?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. That is the information they have received, namely, that there is a 20-acre tract laid off and platted, and they do not sell off all these lands.

Mr. MADDEN. In their plat is there any provision made for public squares or school squares or anything of that kind?

Mr. RAKER. That is in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there something laid off for something in every tract?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather unable to follow the gentleman——

Mr. RAKER. I am not responsible for the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to complain of the practice of the Reclamation Service in the sale of these lots?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield right there any more. I have answered that, no.

Mr. MONDELL. This law does not change the plans of the sale of lots any.

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield any further on that.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I thought not.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I make it plain. I have answered that so far as the Reclamation Service is concerned. I am not complaining, but here is a new policy, which is intended to be inaugurated by this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, I am trying to get information upon which I can base an honest judgment in connection with this bill. I have not made up my mind how I am going to vote on it. What I want to know is whether—assuming that a town site is 160 acres—whether all the lots covering the whole 160 acres are laid out and submitted for purchase to intending buyers at the same time, or whether there is only a 10-acre tract submitted?

Mr. RAKER. As I understand from the hearings, there is only a part of the 160 or 640 acres, as the case might be, platted and offered for sale. Now, then, that is the policy that has been inaugurated.

Now, coming back to where I left off when interrupted, on the 20-acre tract in the town, with banks, and stores, and residences, the people have all this property and have paid for it, knowing the exact conditions of the surrounding country as well as in the town, just like the former town sites of our public domain which have been in existence since 1860—just like in every other new town. And the people that use these particular tracts of land, the settled part of land, are assessed to pay the taxes. Go out over the West, and you can find hundreds of these towns, with tracts of land lying out a quarter of a mile away sometimes that are practically assessed nothing and pay nothing, so far as the advancement and improvement of the town is concerned. They are not needed. Now, if the Government desires to use this land, if it is intended by the reserve to withdraw it for town sites, is the Government going to use it by virtue of laying off the entire tract, appraising its value according to where it lies, and then offer it for sale, by covering the whole 160 acres? And if you find men that will go in there and buy that whole 160-acre tract under those sales, have you not answered the argument of the gentlemen here that the Government ought to enter into the development of municipalities?

If you find men that will go in there and buy that 160-acre tract under those conditions are you not answering the argument of the gentleman here, that the Government ought to enter into the development of municipalities? Here is a 160-acre tract. Every foot of it has been sold and is under private ownership. Some individuals will improve it. Some will put on it large, fine buildings. Others will build their homes on it. Others will improve it in one way and another, and every foot of the land within the whole 640-acre tract will be under assessment for municipal purposes as well as for State and county purposes. Then why do you say to these people living in this community, "We will take small tracts only, and we will permit them to be improved. We will sell no more."

Now, see what we are coming to. "We will sell no more of this land." The people who have gone in there have done so with the idea that this land shall be built up, and that at some time it will be a flourishing little village or city, thinking that they would be able to handle it themselves and impose the taxes and vote what kind of street improvements there should be, what kind of public buildings they should have for the entertainment of those who live there, what kind of an electric-light plant they should have. You provide by this bill, because the property has not been sold as it should have been, that these citizens have not the right to specify the kind or the character of the public improvements that should be made there.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not just now. The gentleman does not say that the citizens shall pay half of this public improvement. The gentleman did not say that they shall have a voice as to what shall be their first improvement—an electric-light plant, or a sewer system, or a water system, or a system of street lights, or a public road, or a schoolhouse; but the Secretary of the Interior, 3,000 miles away, dictates and says: "You shall first do this, or this, and I will use all your funds for the purpose of building a schoolhouse."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman if he means to convey the idea that under this bill in a city that is organized and has a municipal government of its own, the Secretary of the Interior would dictate?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; up until it is fully organized and two years after it is organized. And it has been thoroughly discussed and to my satisfaction it has been clearly answered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] that these towns now on the reclamation projects—I have just looked into the record and I find that none of them have been incorporated—never would organize by incorporation, for the same reason, as you can see, that when the Government builds a system of improvements there is no provision by which it can ever let go of it, and it will still be compelled to pay the public funds to maintain it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is mistaken in his statement that the towns are not incorporated.

Mr. RAKER. What one is incorporated?

Mr. MONDELL. Powell, for example. Will the gentleman support the bill if it is amended so that all its expenditures are by the municipality?

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. When was Powell incorporated? I will say to the gentleman that I sent down to the Census Office to find out, and the return is that none of these towns are incorporated.

Mr. MANN. The census return for what year?

Mr. RAKER. For 1910.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, Powell was a salt sage flat in 1910.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not usually so far behind the times.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming says that Powell is now incorporated?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. Will the gentleman support the bill if it is amended so that all expenditures shall be paid by the municipality?

Mr. RAKER. Why, I have stated again and again that every cent of the money that would come from the sale of the lots within these reserved tracts of land after the payment of the cost of administration might go to the municipalities if they handled it. But I want to call attention to another thing——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman support the bill if it is so amended that the funds shall go to the municipalities, to be expended by them?

Mr. RAKER. By the municipalities?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman will remember that in the committee and otherwise I stated "yes." But this bill is so far different from that in every particular that there is not any chance on earth to amend it except by striking out the enacting clause and letting it die.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, if the gentleman will look at the bill he will see that there is a section that provides that where the municipalities are organized all future receipts shall go directly to them. It would be very easy for the gentleman to amend that so as to provide that all funds, accrued and hereafter to be received, shall go the same way.

Mr. RAKER. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to another fact. There is no limitation in this bill as to the amount of money that would be expended by the Secretary of the Interior upon any one particular improvement. Every municipality specifies the limit, in the first place, of the taxation that can be had for the purpose of that particular improvement every year, and when you raise, say, 1 per cent of the taxable property for this purpose and 34 per cent for another purpose and 10 per cent for another purpose you can expend only the amount of money for that year according to the amount specified, and the constitutions of the States so specify. But under this bill there is a carte blanche order to take all the money that has been raised from the lands in advance up to the present time and take all the money that might be raised and put it into one particular improvement—the idea of one man—without the consent or advice or vote of a single individual resident of that town.

Now, do we want to build up on behalf of the Government municipalities in that way? Ought we not to go to work and put up these lots at the appraised value? Every lot in this 160 acres is marked off, and an appraised value is marked on it, and if you want to buy a lot in that town you can go and buy it. I say, let these people build up the town. It will depend on the ingenuity and capability and progress of the citizens of that town whether or not the remaining lots are sold at the appraised value and just how much that municipality brings it up to, instead of this Government as a Government entering upon the policy of building cities, dressing them up in their best bib and tucker, and putting one out here in the mountains, and then inviting citizens to go out there and live in this improved first-class municipality without anybody on earth there to know how it should be run and how it should be conducted.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. MANN. What is the distinction in practice between the Government constructing an irrigation plant instead of turning over the wild land to the people to construct the plant for themselves, and the Government agreeing to sell town lots with the agreement that they will construct certain necessary and essential municipal improvements?

Mr. RAKER. There seems to be as much difference as between day and night, in every conceivable way.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is hardly an answer to the question.

Mr. RAKER. In the limited time I would not be prepared to answer it, and in the next place I would like to have an opportunity to go into it to some extent, so that I might clearly present the distinction between the Government going on with its reclamation scheme that it has and the theory of building up municipalities.

Mr. MANN. It would be quite possible for the Government to permit the individuals to go there and take up lands and construct irrigation plants, would it not, just as it is possible for the Government to give out town sites at an appraised value, and let the people, when assembled there, construct the municipal improvements? The first, admittedly, is impracticable, and the second, admittedly, is impossible at first.

Mr. RAKER. The contention of the gentleman from Wyoming that no well-regulated land-shark addition promoter would offer to sell town lots until he had gone to work and built sidewalks and roads and other improvements in that particular tract that he was going to sell, has no bearing here. There is no conceivable likeness between one case and the other.

The addition has a city back of it to supply the places where its people can work, and those people go out there for a place to build residences and to build up little grocery stores, while the people go out to these town sites for the purpose of building grocery stores, hotels, and other buildings and getting the advantage that is coming from being in a community that will be as rich as these communities will be by virtue of irrigating this desert land. First, the natural increase is going to build it up and enhance the value of their property, and their trade with those people will improve, and they will make money just as men do in every other place. Now, the gentleman answers that we should hold this land to enhance its value. Is that fair? Is that an argument? You have 20 acres laid off in town lots, streets, hotels, and for other necessary buildings. The argument is that we should not sell the remaining town lots now. Think of it. They would not bring a large price. It is said, "Wait until this surrounding country is settled with flourishing farms and other improvements. Wait till the individuals already there have built it up and made a market and other people would like to come in and participate in that town, and then the Government will sell the remaining tracts of land and we will get a higher price." Why, that is the old land-shark scheme that you find in all these frontier towns; first, to keep from paying taxes, and then hold back the sale of the land, if a man has the means, until the town has advanced and he can sell his property at a high price. It is not consistent. It is not the way to build up a community. The aim of the Government under the act is to open it up.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment. I want to complete this thought. I can not repeat too often that it is intended under the act that the whole 640 acres shall be appraised, and if the first sale does not take it all, they should continue to readvertise it and sell it. Now, if the whole tract is appraised by competent appraisers and put up at public auction, a man will take each lot that he wants to take at that price. Everybody will be treated fair and right, and I ask the committee, Will it not give that town an opportunity to improve legitimately and for men to come in there and buy wherever they want to, one tract down here for residence and another in the center of the town for business purposes? Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman's argument is not directed to the bill under consideration, for the bill under consideration in nowise modifies the policy relative to the matters that he refers to. But speaking of that general policy, which will go on whether this bill passes or not, the gentleman says, "Turn the towns loose."

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; not loose.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, sell all the lots. Now, how are you going to sell 640 acres of land in a new country for town-lot purposes for anything more than a mere song? Does the gentleman think they could have opened the town of Newell and sold the 640 acres for much, if any, more than they obtained for the 20 acres which they sold?

Mr. RAKER. The town of Newell, according to the statement here, is in the center of a good agricultural district. All the surrounding land is taken up by homesteads and otherwise. Now, if every tract in the Newell town site of 640 acres had been platted and opportunity given for the sale of the lots, men would have gone in there, just as they do in other places, and invested $100, $200, $500, or $600, until you had your whole 640 acres sold, and you would have obtained a fair value for it at the time.

Mr. MONDELL. At the time.

Mr. RAKER. It was all new then, and we all have to stand upon a level on these matters. But men would have bought it at that time, and for the last 10 years they would have been paying taxes to the State, county, and municipality; and their land as a necessity would enhance and should be worth more to-day, and it should be handled in that method instead of the Government handling it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the bill under consideration in nowise modifies the manner of opening these town sites for sale. He realizes that fact?

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. And we do not change the present condition or the present policy for the sale of lots. We do not change it if we defeat this bill. We do not modify it if we pass the bill.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman and the committee will bear with me just a moment, I shall have finished what I have to say. The policy brings about the things they are now trying to have passed. I am not complaining against anyone, but I am trying to present the facts as they appear to exist. If they want more taxable property, sell the land within the reservation, and the people will buy and make homes on the tracts of land. I am making these statements trying to bring to your mind the fact that the Government is trying to embark, by virtue of the policy of this bill, upon building up municipalities. In other words, imagine yourself out here in a wild country, taking the gentleman's statement, with 200,000 acres of desert land surrounding it, with a few settlers in the town. Admit that eventually they will be fine farms, but while the farms are being improved and the country put in proper shape this bill says that we will go out there and dress up a dandy little town; we will build a water system, a sewer system, an electric light system, and a heating system, and many other municipal buildings, and then we will turn it over to them. That is my objection to the bill. The people themselves will improve as fast as their means will permit and as fast as their surroundings and environments and patriotism and desire for improvement will admit.

It is like bringing up a young man—if you want him to do anything, you have got to give him some of the practical things of life; you have got to give these people some of the ideas and an opportunity to study by which they themselves can bring up the town and not at once prepare a municipality for them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from California permit me a question?

Mr. RAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I heard the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] say a moment ago that this proposition in nowise seeks to modify the law. Now, it appears to me in a hasty glance at the report that it does materially modify the law. I want to ask the gentleman from California, first, if it does not modify the law, and, second, if the people who have interested themselves in the town sites have not gone into them with the full knowledge of all the conditions, if they have not taken their chances, as they should do, and gone in there with a perfect knowledge of what their rights are?

Mr. RAKER. Answering the gentleman, first, this bill does change, as of necessity, the existing law as to the handling of these projects. Answering the second part of the gentleman's question, it is the very essence of this bill that these men went there, bought these tracts of land, bought them with their eyes open, knowing the conditions of the surrounding country, knowing that this town is going to be built up by virtue of these people being permitted to buy as the Government offered to sell.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill does not in any manner affect the policy of the Reclamation Service. It simply provides for the disposition of the moneys received, and the Reclamation Service under this bill can follow the policy that it has followed; there is nothing in the bill to prevent it. The policy will not be modified by this legislation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not the floor. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I perhaps misunderstood the gentleman from Wyoming a few minutes ago. This is a diversion project, to divert the funds that would go into the treasury of the reclamation itself.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas is usually accurate, but not accurate at this time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Heretofore the proceeds of the sale of town lots has been credited to farmers of the surrounding project. We are now proposing under this legislation to give a part of the benefit of these sales to the men in the town.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It takes it from the farmers of the surrounding country.

Mr. MONDELL. Practically.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman think that is wise?

Mr. MONDELL. My friend, the farmer from Texas, rises at once at that proposition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Naturally; I come from that class.

Mr. MONDELL. The farmer will be benefited by the fact that they will secure very much more for the other lots by reason of the increased value.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will not the town benefit more quickly and largely by the increased prosperity of the farmer?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but the owner of the town site is entitled to a share of the value which he creates.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I want to state to my colleague from Texas that I made the statement in my remarks which I made to the House that this money they propose to spend here for municipal improvement comes out of the Public Treasury, and I stick to that statement. You take the reclamation fund and it is always either in the Public Treasury of the United States or owing to it. The law contemplates that every dollar of it shall be turned back into the Treasury at some time or other, and all of it ultimately. This proposition is to take the money and donate it to the people in these municipalities never to be returned to the reclamation fund. It comes out of the Public Treasury. That is the proposition I started out with and one I stick to, and no gentleman here can deny that that is the proposition. It is the first time in the history of the Reclamation Service that a proposition has been made to divert the money to some purpose never to be returned to the Public Treasury.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read a part of the provision of the law governing this matter:

That the Secretary of the Interior may withdraw from public entry any lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, not exceeding 160 acres in each case, and survey and subdivide the same into town lots with appropriate reservation for public purposes.

That covers the subject we discussed a moment ago.

That the lots so surveyed shall be appraised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and sold under his direction at not less than their appraised value at public auction to the highest bidders from time to time for cash, and the lots offered for sale and not disposed of may afterwards be sold at not less than the appraised value under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. Reclamation funds may be used to defray the necessary expenses of appraisement and sale, and the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is expected ultimately all to find its way into the Treasury?

Mr. RAKER. All to find its way into the Treasury. Here is a scheme provided that seems to be and is very clear and specific, and if carried out is proper; but here comes another, that the Secretary of the Interior may build, equip, and operate completely the municipal improvements until two years after a town is incorporated. Let us see right there. Of the towns now existing on the reclamation projects, as far as I am advised, none are incorporated. If the reclamation project pays one-half of the funds from the sale of these town lots and once starts a project, pray tell me, is this municipality going to take it over and pay for its running, or is the Department of the Interior, under the Secretary, going to maintain this particular municipal improvement and to continue for years and years to do so? In other words, we are embarking upon a policy of building up municipalities by the Government and conducting them at the expense of the Government for people who desire to go out into these towns or who may already be there. One of the contentions presented by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] is that there was an advertisement that the Government would build these projects—that it would go into this business. There is no connection between that and the department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Was that advertisement by any recognized official of the Federal Government?

Mr. RAKER. So far as we have been able to discover, no. It was published by some railroad. That is all. That being the case, even if it was—even if the Government was behind it—they had no authority to do it. These men knew and could have found out before they bought over their title. They could have found out, under the act I have just read, just what the conditions were, and they would have purchased with their eyes open, knowing exactly what will be done. Therefore, we ought not to pass this sort of bill, or any of its provisions, which will permit the going into and the preparing of towns in advance with an entire system for maintaining the town, without the people's consent, and then turning it over to them and saying, "Take it and run it."

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I deem it my duty as a member of the committee that favorably reported the bill to express my individual views as to its merits. I am frank to say that I was opposed to its provisions and its general purposes at first blush, and, in fact, it took some time to remove my educated prejudices against its purpose. I have been taught, as many of the membership have been taught more or less owing to circumstances, to guard against encroachments upon our institutions and not permit our General Government, especially, to embark upon a course of paternalism, and I felt that the provisions of the bill were calculated to accomplish such infringements. I had read, when I was a boy, the works of authors strongly opposing centralized governments and pleading for the decentralization of our own Federal Government as it was, even at that time, administered.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In the good old days.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes. I am still in favor of State rights, all the rights which the States possess, and I am frank to say that I am jealous of those rights. But I am being convinced by observation that an evolution has been going on in the convictions of the people and in the sentiments of our people as to what governments may properly do for the people, and if we will compare the present with 20 or 30 years ago we will perceive a marked difference in opinion held by the same people, able jurists, able statesmen, who have been administering the law and legislating enactments as to the proper province of government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am interested in what the gentleman stated about his own political position, that he had started out a firm advocate of State rights, and that he believed in them still to some extent, but that he had observed a trend in the minds of the public generally in the direction of favoring centralized government. The question I want to ask the gentleman is this: Does he not think that trend has been largely induced and accelerated by appropriations, or the hope of appropriations, out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, first, that I do not accept his version of my statement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope I did not misstate the gentleman's position?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I am sure the gentleman did not intend to do me any injustice, but I do not accept his version of my statement at all. I believe yet in States having all the rights reserved to the States or the people or not granted to the National Government. I think I may grant an affirmative answer to the question the gentleman put that as to the change in sentiment, the trend has been accelerated, perhaps by selfish interests or motives or by appropriations which might be secured.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is like Mark Twain's suggestion of the old flag and an appropriation. The sentiment in the South was developed very rapidly after the war by the hope of an appropriation, I think.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. And by the improvement of rivers and harbors, and all that. I think those things have done a great deal of good for our common country. I think they have helped to bring the North and the South together again, as they had been.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In one grand raid.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. And we all join hands, especially when the omnibus public-buildings bill comes up; and we are all brothers then, and we are all State rights men then, and especially for the National Government at that time. Speaking seriously, I favor a strong National Government, positive and supreme in its limited sphere.

Coming to the question, there is much in a name, Mr. Chairman. We deride paternalism, those of us who are opposed to it. We deride socialism, but conservationism is popular. We are all conservationists, and only differ as to how we are going to administer the policy. You will not find a single Member of the House who is not a devout conservationist. The only question is, How are you going to administer the policy? If this bill had been entitled "A bill for the conservation of increases in values of town sites under irrigation projects and securing the same to entrymen under the projects and purchasers of town lots," its acceptability would have been greatly improved.

I have listened with deep interest to the lucid and luminous talks made upon this question this afternoon. As a member of the Committee on Irrigation, I listened to the presentation of the facts, and there is where I started out as being averse to the bill, but gradually my educated prejudice and imbibed and possibly inherited prejudices against the measure melted away before the cogent reasoning of the facts as they were presented. Then, coming on the floor to-day and hearing the able arguments made this afternoon, with the pertinent questions that were interposed and the answers to those questions, have tended to make my conviction stronger than when I came into the House or those which I entertained when the bill was favorably reported by our committee. I think the bill contains merit and that it would be an improvement upon the present law to enact it. The more you turn it over and look at it up one side and down the other and turn it around and view it from every standpoint, the more you will be convinced that it is a proposition for conservation, for the conservation of values and profits, for the conservation of opportunities, and while there is a little paternalism about it, yet on account of the beneficence of the measure I am ready to waive my objection to the theory of paternalism and join hands for the enactment of the law, because it secures to those worthy pioneers, those worthy home builders on the farm and in the town, a share in the results of their going to the front and casting their lot in a new country and helping to build up a progressive, wide-awake, prosperous community, and to build up American citizenship.

There is a peculiar community of interest in an irrigation locality. There is a community of interest in the undertaking that does not exist where they go in single-handed and every fellow for himself, where there is no irrigation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But this particular bill does not propose to help the people who are growing the crops, as I understand it, but the town-lot people. Is not that true?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I am glad the gentleman reminds me of that. It takes nothing away from the entryman or farmer on the land that he has ever had. It creates something which never would have existed except for the law. It conserves the value in the town sites until they have doubled in value, trebled in value, and quadrupled in value, and the Government conserves this value by holding it, while it secures to the entryman one half of it and the town-site investor the other half of it. It secures to them the increase in value which they cause jointly by going in and developing that community. Now, we all stand for the entryman, one of us as much as the other—and there is no question about that—and this gives him twice as much in getting 50 per cent under the law proposed as he would have received had he gotten 100 per cent under the old law or the law that now exists. It creates by the beneficence of the law of conservation a capital as the joint result of the townsmen and the farmers that they never would have had without it, and the Government secures to them righteously that which is right and beneficent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As I understand the reclamation act, the proceeds of all sales are ultimately to find their way back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I thank you. I intend to speak about that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And this proposes to permanently divert a part of the proceeds of the sales, to take it away from all the people, and assign it for the benefit of a few citizens in a few towns that may become cities ultimately. Is not that right?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Thank you. I intend to touch that. At first blush it does. Again, it never would have existed if it were not for this beneficent policy. If the Government can be permitted to go on there and administer unselfishly, as a government can and will, instead of an individual administering selfishly, as he can and will, it will create the fund there whereby the Government is the better insured to get the money that it parted with in the first place, and that is all it is entitled to. But it goes on and makes it easier; it creates this fund for the settlers, and it is divided between the farmers and the townsmen. After they get their share the Government is better secured, because they owe less, and get the same lands, and they are better security for the Government.

Now, mind you, the Government is not speculating here. The national reclamation law is merely for the purpose of developing these irrigation projects and getting back without interest what the Government put in, and the Government does not aim to get any more back. So you are not diminishing the amount to be paid back to the Government. On the other hand, you are not permitting anyone to stand as a speculator and reap the benefit from the service of the settlers who go in there.

A country is nothing at all without people. The district I have the honor to represent is worth more per acre, or the most of it, by five times than it was when I first took my seat in this House.

Mr. MANN. Due, of course, to your presence here. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Due to the people of that district. This House was kind enough and wise enough to pass the right kind of a homestead law, giving them 640 acres instead of a quarter section. That induced people to come in. Everybody found that that was best for everybody else. Everybody has a community interest in the prosperity of everybody else.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the average value of 640 acres now?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It varies greatly. Some of it is worth $5, some of it is worth——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Some of it $50?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. You might get some 40 acres somewhere, under peculiar circumstances, that will be worth that much.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It will be worth $5 an acre?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. For grazing purposes it might be; yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much has it increased since the Government conceded the 640-acre homestead?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It has very greatly increased. I suppose some 400 or 500 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then some of it was not worth anything before.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Now, the more this thing is turned over the more cogent do the reasons appeal to me that it will be the strongest kind of an example of conservation if enacted into law. No one can show that the Government will lose anything. The national irrigation law, literally construed, and taken in its spirit, contemplates only that the money invested in the first place should be paid back to it, and it does not contemplate that any speculation will be made out of the lands, and it does contemplate that all the rise in value will inure to the hardy pioneer, to the settler who goes in there and casts his lot with the rest and builds up that community. So this bill, if enacted into law, can not be construed to take away anything from the General Government, but all it is intended to do is to conserve to those worthy pioneer home builders in the towns and in the country the result of their efforts in going in there and building up the community. It conserves to them the added value which arises therefrom.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Now, they talk about escaping taxation. They point out that the land would become subject to tax if sold at the start. Certainly; that is clear enough. But by wise management the Government will sell it out for ten times as much as all these taxes will aggregate. I believe in the Government taking a hand in the matter when it can do so much, and it is only going to continue for a very short time. It does not last always. It terminates itself in a short time. This is not perpetual. The people will take over the entire project before a great while. It is all their own. They will take over the city government and the land, and they will control this matter directly.

I want to emphasize my view that some legislation is essential here. It is rendered necessary by the existing condition of things. The present law works the greatest injustice that you can contemplate by the operation of a law passed so recently, and relief ought to be given, and it seems to me this will be wise and beneficent legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that when a town site is established, whether it be 160 acres or 640, all the lots within the town should be platted and offered for sale, and any intending purchaser should be permitted to select a lot anywhere within the boundaries of the town site and make his purchase at such place within the site as he may think best for him instead of as now, platting only 10 acres in the whole town site and offering for sale lots only within that 10-acre plat?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that I would have no serious objection to platting the whole town site at the start in order that everybody might know the relation of things in general to his purchase or to the purchase that he contemplated making. He could tell more about it in that way than if only 20 acres were platted and disposed of at the start.

But I say it is better not to sell it all. I say that herein consists conservation. The value will be conserved and secured to the farmer and townsman, who will benefit from the rise in value.

Now, I appeal to the membership of this body as to who is the better entitled to the rise in value—the farmer and townsman or the speculator? I have no objection to the legitimate speculator, but the mere speculator does nothing but come in there and buy a lot, puts improvements on it or not, just as he chooses. He may hold back a block and not improve it for 20 years and still get the benefit of the rise in value which comes from the improvements made by those who have made improvements and caused by the development of the neighboring community, and thus he may stand in the way of the development and not sell his property for a reasonable price.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But he takes the increment?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes; he would stand in the way. He would be selfish, and if any individual controls a town site, or several individuals, they would be selfish, naturally, and if one individual buys up a town site he would manage it to suit himself and his own interests and those of his heirs.

Now, the Government will administer it for the interest and benefit of the public and for the benefit of those pioneers who go in there and make that condition of things which makes the property valuable.

Mr. RAKER. Under all the irrigation projects, so far as the price is concerned, the price to the Government is the same. It is just the same, whether you file on a tract of land under a reclamation project to-day or 10 years hence or 5 years past, is it not?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Under the town-site plats ought it not to be the same way after you fix an appraised value, so that every man that goes in there ought to get his tract of land at that price? Is not that fair?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Members may differ on that.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that conservation? Is not that getting down to actual working methods?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. No; I think that is business; not conservation. That is business to the man who wants to speculate. But I think it is very wise and fair and salutary to give the home builder the benefit of this rise in value which occurs in a short time.

Mr. Chairman, by platting out a 20-acre town site to start with, without letting it be known exactly how the town would be expanded, I grant has its disadvantages. In such case it would not be known where the public park would be and where the public buildings will be, and where the streets would be, and so forth. Those things should be had well in mind. But if the Government can start a town where there is a community of interest and hold it together in the interest of everybody, after a while it will be a place of beauty and one that will afford conveniences for the surrounding country.

I am very grateful for the attention which the Members have given me. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the attention of the committee, and especially that of some gentlemen who are particularly posted as to the reclamation law. As I understand the law, where it is proposed to enter upon a reclamation project the land that is included within that project is withdrawn from ordinary settlement; is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is withdrawn from settlement, except under the provisions of the national reclamation law.

Mr. MANN. All the gentleman needed to do was to say "yes," then, to my question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think I did better than that in my answer.

Mr. MANN. Now, under that situation the Government proceeds with a reclamation project. It constructs irrigation works, dams, and whatever may be necessary. It authorizes people entitled to the benefits of the homestead law to take up certain areas of land—different amounts, I believe, in different irrigation projects—and to enter them under the homestead law. The Government does not make any charge for the land, although the land may be worth a very high price. The only charge that is made for the land, if I am correct, is a proportionate part of the cost of the project.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. And that is irrespective of the time when the entry is made.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The proportionate part of the cost to any particular settler is the amount which it bears to the whole cost of the project. The Government pays nothing. The Government is completely reimbursed.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the Government ever will be completely reimbursed; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is the theory.

Mr. MANN. The theory is that the Government will be reimbursed for its principal, not for interest.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. The Government exacts from each homesteader a proportionate part of the cost of the improvement, and in addition a proportionate part of the cost of maintenance and operation. There is no charge for the land except for the works which are constructed to add to the value of the land. Whoever gets the first entry may, if he is fortunate in his selection, obtain the most valuable piece of land. But none of these settlers can establish a town site at first, and in order that people may have the necessary benefits of a municipality—of stores and other things that go with the central location—the Government provides for a town-site reservation and for the disposition of the lots in the town site; and because a particular lot or a particular location in a town may be of considerable value when the other portions of the town are of small value, the Government, instead of saying that the person who gets the first choice shall have the opportunity to take the first lot, offers these lots for sale.

It has been suggested by gentlemen that wherever 640 acres or 160 acres are reserved the entire tract should be subdivided into lots and offered for sale at one time. But gentlemen will quickly see, I think, that that is not to the interest of the Government or of the municipality or of the people who locate there. It is desirable, by way of making improvements in a small community, to have the community centralized so that they can have these improvements. But if you open 640 acres, or a mile square, and open all the lots for sale at one time, no one can tell where the lots of principal value will be, and so you may have a store or a center at one end of the mile and another store or center at the other end of the mile which may be to the interest of the people who own the particular lots, but is not to the interest of the community which ought to have necessary improvements in the locality where the people are.

Now, the proposition that the Government has adopted is to open a small portion of the reservation and sell that in lots at once. That puts the center of the town at a particular place. Just as soon as people buy these lots there are certain improvements needed. Everyone will admit that a schoolhouse is needed at once. A water supply is needed at once. I do not know whether it is practicable to furnish the water supply in connection with the irrigation works, but it is quite certain that in any town at any place a supply of water is absolutely necessary. There must be some method of sewage disposal. Perhaps primitive methods may satisfy in some places, but there may be other places where the community will be so large that the primitive methods are not sufficient in connection with the water supply which may be obtained.

Now, what is the proposition here? The Government making no charge whatever to the farmers who take the land that is irrigated, but furnishing the irrigation works at cost—and in the end the Government will lose upon every one of the irrigation projects—it is proposed by this bill that when the Government sells town lots it will agree that a certain proportion of the money paid for the lots shall be used in municipal improvements.

I suppose the first thing would be a schoolhouse. If the place were or needed to be a county seat, it might become necessary to provide county buildings, though I take it that would not be done unless the entire county were in a reclamation project, which probably never has occurred. It might be necessary to have a city hall. It is quite essential to have sidewalks. It is quite essential to have graded streets. The necessity for water is apparent. Gentlemen might suppose from some of the speeches we have had here, or from the reading of the bill itself, that the Government intended to construct great schoolhouses, water towers, waterworks, sewage-disposal systems, lighting establishments, and everything of the sort. But there is one thing which will prevent most of that. That is a lack of money. Take the town of Newell, where I apprehend the lots sold perhaps as high as anywhere, and where the total amount which has been realized as yet is in the neighborhood of $40,000. Twenty-five acres were sold. That would cover the disposition of from 3,000 to 6,000 feet front, depending upon the depth of the lot and the width of the street. If lots were 125 feet deep, on a 66-foot street to an alley, it would cover in the neighborhood of 6,000 feet. Well, upon 6,000 feet, which is a little more than a mile, you could not spend a great deal in the way of a schoolhouse and waterworks and a lighting system and sewers and everything of that sort for $20,000. You would not proceed so very far in that direction.

But it seems to me it is desirable that when the Government is providing for these irrigation projects, when it is constructing an irrigation system for the benefit of the people who will occupy the farming area, it shall at the same time provide something for the people who intend to live in the town. We provide water for the farms, but without this bill we provide no water for those who live in the town. It is just as essential to have water in the town as it is to have water on the farm.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not provided by the general bill that the Reclamation Service shall provide water for the towns, as well as any electrical energy that may be generated?

Mr. MANN. I know of no method under a reclamation project of providing water for the town except it comes from the irrigation ditch.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And for irrigation purposes.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the cost of water used by the farmers is paid back to the Government, but here you propose to furnish it to the town as a donation.

Mr. MANN. The reason of that is that we donate the land entirely to the farmer; we do not sell it; we give it to him. If we sold it, he would be in the same position that the man is who purchases the town lot. We give that land to him; it costs him nothing as far as the land is concerned. We sell the town lots. The proposition is that we take 50 per cent of that for improvements. We take all that we get from the farmer for improvements.

All that he pays goes into improvements which he uses, it is true, strictly for his benefit. This proposition is to take one-half of that that you get from the lot buyer to make improvements for his benefit. It is, I believe, to the interest of the Government and the people to construct the irrigation projects, to pay out the money for improvements and only take back the cost of them, and I also believe that it is desirable when we construct a town to provide for these things which are absolutely essential to the community, which must be had, and which the community in the first instance is not able to provide.

Here we provide for selling town lots on a raw piece of property, where there is no method of government, no method of taxation the first year, but the need of schools and the need of water comes from the time there are any children there or any people living on the place.

With these observations, Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of the committee to some provisions of the bill. "The first provision of the bill is that one-half of the net proceeds heretofore"—and with an amendment hereafter—"received from the sale of town lots shall be devoted," and so forth.

Now, as I understand the theory of this proposition, it is that when you offer lots for sale with a statement that one-half of the proceeds of these lots shall be devoted toward the necessary municipal improvements, that people will pay more for the lots. A man would be very foolish, it seems to me, to pay as much for a lot in a community where no schoolhouses were provided, where no water was provided, where nothing was provided, as he would pay for a lot where sidewalks were to be constructed, streets provided, schoolhouses built, and water was to be furnished.

Gentlemen say, however, that the Government has already in selling these lots practically promised these improvements by literature which has been circulated. Of course, as to lots which have already been sold, without any assurance that these improvements can be made, there can be no claim that the Government is under any obligation to construct municipal improvements for the benefit of the people who bought lots without the expectation of receiving those improvements. I do not know, except as has been stated here, whether practically, though not intentionally, fraud may have been committed upon people who buy these lots at other places than the one that has been referred to by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], where apparently men were induced to pay a high price for lots with the assumption, and the proper assumption, that the Government would undertake certain improvements which there was no authority in fact to undertake.

I would like to ask the gentleman, however, in regard to the amount that this bill proposes to set aside. It proposes to set aside 50 per cent of the proceeds for municipal improvements. We have passed in recent years a number of bills opening Indian reservations. We passed one on Monday last where we set aside 20 per cent of the receipts from lots for making municipal improvements. If 20 per cent was the proper figure in an Indian reservation, why should 50 per cent be the proper figure in a reclamation project? Or, if 50 per cent is the proper amount on a reclamation project, why did we fix 20 per cent on an Indian reservation town site?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman asked the question with the expectation of its being answered at once or not; but I might say, if the gentleman will permit, that I think the relation between the two is altogether different. Here are lands belonging to the Indians of which the Government is the trustee; every dollar that comes out of the sale of Indian lands goes to the Indians. I can see how, under those circumstances, a very low amount might be mentioned as the proportion that was to be given to the Indians' share of improvements. Those considerations would hardly apply here. As to this particular instance, the gentleman has shown from his argument that 50 per cent would go but very little ways in making the necessary improvements that would be required at once on the organization of the town.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the distinction between the reclamation project and the Indian lands. Under the law as it now stands any money received from the sale of town lots goes to reduce the amount which the farmer on the irrigated land is charged with as a part of the cost of construction. On the Indian reservation it goes to pay to the Indian the amount for which the lots are sold. I can see no difference in principle, because, I take it, both propositions are based upon the fundamental idea that the value of these improvements will be added to the price at which the property is sold. It is in the nature of a special assessment, and the theory of a special assessment in municipal improvements is that when the improvement is made it adds that much more to the value of the land. That is the theory throughout the country upon which waterworks, sewer systems, sidewalks, and roads are built.

I would like to ask a few questions in reference to section 3, which is:

> That all income received from a portion of any such building or works while under the control of the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid into and become a part of the reclamation town-site fund.

What income can be received from these works except from the waterworks, the lighting system, or something of that kind? If you construct waterworks out of this fund and operate the waterworks and charge for the use of the water, upon what theory do you propose to pay that money into the reclamation fund, where it is merely for the cost of operation?

Mr. LAFFERTY. The money is paid into the town-site fund and not into the reclamation fund.

Mr. MANN. That is the same thing.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It might be money derived from the rent of a city hall.

Mr. MANN. It might be, but I do not think they rent the city hall anywhere. It contemplates the construction of waterworks and a lighting system. This necessarily contemplates that the people who receive the benefit will pay the special assessment.

They will pay for the water received and they will pay for the light received. That is part of the cost of maintenance. Why should not that money be used for maintenance?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I suggest whether that is not the practical working out of the section. The Secretary of the Interior is given authority to operate and maintain for a limited time, and this provides that such income as he gets during that period shall be applied to this same fund—the reclamation town-site fund.

Mr. MANN. He pays for that out of the 50 per cent. What the cost of operation would be no one knows. It might be considerable, and any money that comes in from the ordinary operation of a waterworks plant or a lighting system ought to be used toward the maintenance of the plant.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I think the gentleman from Illinois is right about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Would not that be the practical effect of this provision?

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. MONDELL. The intent of the provision is to direct that the income shall go into and become part of the fund. Then the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall operate these works during the time they are under his charge from the town-site fund.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is certainly the purpose of it. It should be made clear, if it is not.

Mr. MONDELL. It is simply a provision drawn by the department, the intent of which is to direct the flow of any income into the reclamation fund. Of course it is taken right out again if any part of it is needed for operating expenses.

Mr. MANN. That may be correct. Another provision that the department, I suppose, drew has excited my curiosity, and I would like to ask about that. That is in reference to the cemeteries, where it is proposed that cemeteries shall be held under certain conditions until such time as a "municipal corporation or corporations shall be created." Where a cemetery reservation is made for a town site, how many municipal corporations does the gentleman expect to be created out of that town site?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I suppose that language has been suggested by the department upon the theory that often a cemetery is not owned by the municipality itself, but by a cemetery association. It is quite common. During my brief service in this House we have passed many acts of Congress which gave certain public lands to cemetery associations to use in connection with towns or villages.

Mr. MANN. Where you use the language "a municipal corporation or corporations," that does not include cemetery corporations.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman repeats the adjective, and I suppose a liberal construction would not insist upon our doing so.

Mr. MANN. It also refers to a "municipal corporation or corporations for cemetery purposes," and I was just curious to know whether it was expected to have two towns located on a 640-acre town site.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No; I think not.

Mr. MADDEN. If they put the buildings up on each end of the 640 acres, as some gentleman suggests, it might be necessary.

Mr. MANN. It probably would, if they followed the suggestion of my colleague, to sell all the lots at one time. I think that was not contemplated.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I had an idea from that provision that it was to divide off a 10-acre tract in each corner of the 640 acres, and have a little town in each corner, so that there would be no possible question of a rumpus as to the location of the public buildings.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If you separate the towns like that, you probably will have a cemetery of the whole place before a great many years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] desired to have all of these lots put up on appraised value. I do not see how anybody can intelligently in advance appraise the value of a town lot in a proposed new town. When you go into a new country and start a town, with one store building, with very few people living there, that is one thing; but here is a town, to be started in a settled community practically, and a somewhat closely settled community in most places, because in the irrigation projects, as a rule, the amount which any one person can take is not large. You will have a great many people there very early; you will have a pretty fair sized town to start with. I do not see how you can appraise the value of those lots except to let people use their best judgment in reference to them.

How long is it intended, may I ask, under this bill to have the Government run the schools?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It says not exceeding two years.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, I think the bill is clear upon that subject. It is intended that the Government should build the schoolhouses. I do not think it is intended that the Government should run the schools at all.

Mr. MANN. Then, what does the bill mean by "the operation of schoolhouses" and "other school and municipal improvements"?

Mr. MONDELL. Where does the gentleman find that language?

Mr. MANN. Here is a fund that is set aside and created as a special fund in the Treasury to be known as the reclamation town-site fund, to be used in the "construction, maintenance, and operation of schoolhouses, water, light, and sewer systems, and other school and municipal improvements," and so forth.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose the use of the word "operation" there as applied to some of the improvements authorized is not particularly happy. It is necessary with regard to some improvements and so the words "maintenance and operation" were used with regard to all of the improvements which are authorized.

Mr. MANN. Under the language used, would not "the operation of schoolhouses" and "other school and municipal improvements" authorize the maintenance of schools out of this fund, and ought that to be done in any event? If the Government builds the schoolhouses the people ought to maintain the schools.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. I do not think that under any circumstances this would be construed to authorize the department to operate a school or to pay teachers or anything of that sort, but the gentleman will notice that quite a number of matters are referred to here, and then the general terms "construction, maintenance, and operation" are used as applying to them generally.

Mr. MANN. Well, where you say "construction, maintenance, and operation of a schoolhouse and other municipal improvements"—if that does not contemplate the maintenance of a school out of this fund, I fail to understand the English language thoroughly.

Mr. MONDELL. It authorizes a construction and maintenance of schoolhouses and of school improvements, but hardly authorizes the maintenance of a school, I think.

Mr. MANN. What is the operation of a schoolhouse and a school? How else can it be operated?

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say to the gentleman, if I may be allowed, that while I do not disclaim any responsibility, I am not responsible for this particular language. I am not saying I would have constructed it just as it is constructed if I had drafted it, but I think a fair construction would be that they could build a schoolhouse, that they could make their new school improvements, but they could hardly maintain a school.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had trouble enough with the construction by departmental officials——

Mr. MONDELL. I have.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Of laws passed by Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. I speak feelingly on that subject.

Mr. MANN. He knows that language like this would probably be construed to mean the operation of a school if they had the money.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that no one in the House is so well qualified as the gentleman from Illinois to offer such an amendment as would make this clear, and I am sure everybody would accept it.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to say a little while ago that it would be impossible to run the schools without taxation, and that taxation in a town like this would be impossible except as to the lots that had gone into the possession of private ownership, and I wish to ask my colleague if that be the case, whether it will be possible to do anything else except to operate the schools out of these public funds?

Mr. MANN. I think after we provide a schoolhouse we are providing enough for the people to operate the schools themselves in some way.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. If the gentleman has any question about whether the Secretary of the Interior will go into the school business or not, I think he might look around here and see several would-be Secretaries and inform himself on that subject accurately.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is hardly accurate. The gentleman does not see several would-be Secretaries of the Interior in the House, but he can see a number of gentlemen here who would make excellent Secretaries of the Interior if they could be persuaded to leave the House for that purpose.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And even teach school in connection with it.

Mr. MANN. Now, may I ask the gentleman a little further? Take the case that has already been cited, the particular case of Newell. Upon what theory can the gentleman claim that we ought to provide that 50 per cent of all the lands hereafter sold shall be used for municipal improvements, although some of the land may not be sold for 10, 20, 30, 40, or 50 years? How would that be expended for the benefit of that land? It is perfectly apparent, is it not, that if you have the center of a town in one place and a lot out on the outskirts, and you sell that lot after your town is inaugurated, and you have a city council to spend the money, and they will spend the 50 per cent for which the lot on the outskirts sells in front of the lot, it will not enhance the value of that lot 5 cents? Certainly, they will not double its value, because the money which has been spent for municipal improvements will not be spent for the benefit of that lot. How can you defend the proposition that after your town is started, after it is organized, after the first necessary improvements are provided, that thereafter you shall take out one-half of the price for which the other lots sell, when it certainly will not make them sell for any more?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Answering the gentleman, I do not know the basis of his statement that it will not make them sell for any more. I think if any purchaser of a lot, expecting to improve, has knowledge that half which he bids on the lot will be used in betterment of the town in any part, under the direction of the municipal officers, would bid higher for a lot under those circumstances.

Mr. MANN. I have had some experiences with town lots. I am very sure that in the district which I represent, which is a portion of the city of Chicago, not taking in the down-town center which my colleague, Mr. MADDEN, represents, the people out in our part of the town would not pay 10 cents more for a lot in order that half of the purchase price might be spent down town.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is under the administration that spends the money in a part of a town where it is not raised.

Mr. MANN. Every administration in every town spends most of the money on the streets and around the places where the people live. They do not spend it on the vacant property.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I assume the expenditures will be made for municipal improvements in that part of the city where they are most needed, and if we were to add to any community 10 acres additional of town property, I do not see any reason why there should not be some effort to supply sewerage and lighting systems and to extend that portion, and I do not agree with the experiences they have in Chicago would necessarily control in small towns.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means that probably Chicago is not as honestly administered as small towns.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. I can assure the gentleman that a city like Chicago knows more about getting value out of its money than a small town that has never had any experience in municipal government. It is perfectly apparent to any man who has any judgment at all that where a town is located and these improvements provided all you can pay out of this general fund is for the main works.

You can not construct lateral sewers, you can not construct water-pipe service in the streets, you can not put a lighting plant in the streets in these towns. All you can construct out of a fund of this kind are the main works. Now, it is absolutely of no benefit to a particular lot which is not yet sold in the outskirts of a city to spend half the amount of money you sell it for down town, and hence it will not increase the value any.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] desires to move that the committee rise, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 23669) providing for the disposition of town sites in connection with reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY COMMISSION (H. DOC. NO. 1252).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit for the information of Congress the report of the commission appointed by me to carry on the work authorized under act of appropriation of June 25, 1910, which made available $100,000—

> To enable the President, by the employment of accountants and experts * * * to more effectively inquire into the methods of transacting the public business * * * with a view of inaugurating new or changing old methods * * * so as to attain greater efficiency and economy therein, and to ascertain and recommend to Congress what changes in law may be necessary to carry into effect such results of his inquiry as can not be carried into effect by Executive action alone.

Pursuant to this authority a preliminary investigation was instituted under the Secretary to the President with a view to determining what ground should be covered and what staff and organization would be required. This preliminary inquiry was carried on until March, 1911, when, at my request, the term of the appropriation was extended to June 30, 1912, and $75,000 was added.

Of this $175,000 made available for the first two years the amount expended for the preliminary inquiry was $12,252.14, leaving $162,747.86 available for the 15 months remaining after March 8, 1911, when the commission was organized. By special message of January 17, 1912, I requested that $250,000 be made available for the current fiscal year. Only $75,000, however, was appropriated, and to this was attached a restriction to the effect that not more than three salaries could be paid in excess of $4,000 per annum, thereby forcing a complete reorganization of the commission. At the same time the Congress by special resolution requested a report from the commission with recommendations on the organization and work of the Patent Office—this to be submitted to Congress not later than December 10, or a little over three months after the resolution was passed. Although $10,000 additional was appropriated for this purpose, it was impossible within the time to organize a special staff which could do such a highly technical piece of work. A further limitation to constructive work has been found in the short period for which funds have been made available. Many of the problems of administration which should be gone into require months of constant attention. The commission has not felt free to undertake work which could not be reported on before the expiration of the appropriation, and the appropriation for the current fiscal year was not passed until August 24, the authority expiring June 30 following. I mention these facts to indicate some of the handicaps under which the commission has labored in prosecuting one of the most difficult, far-reaching, technical inquiries that has ever been undertaken, and one from which economies have already been realized many times greater than the cost.

In planning the work to be done by the commission the first controlling fact was that there was no basis in information for judgment as to what changes should be made or what would be the effect of any recommended change, no matter how simple it might at first appear. As was stated in my message of January 17, 1912, on the subject:

> This vast organization has never been studied in detail as one piece of administrative mechanism. Never have the foundations been laid for a thorough consideration of the relations of all of its parts. No comprehensive effort has been made to list its multifarious activities or to group them in such a way as to present a clear picture of what the Government is doing. Never has a complete description been given of the agencies through which these activities are performed. At no time has the attempt been made to study all of these activities and agencies with a view to the assignment of each activity to the agency best fitted for its performance, to the avoidance of duplication of plant and work, to the integration of all administrative agencies of the Government, so far as may be practicable, into a unified organization for the most effective and economical dispatch of public business.

The only safe course, therefore, was first to obtain accurate knowledge of the vast administrative mechanism of the Government; get a clear notion of what the officers and agents of the Government were doing in all of its departments, bureaus, and subdivisions; find out how each part of the service was organized for performing its activities, what methods are being employed, what results are being obtained, where there are duplications of work and plant, wherein the organization and methods are ill adapted or ill adjusted.

In each case, as first drafts of descriptive reports have been completed by the commission, they first have been submitted to the services whose organization and work are involved, so that this part of the work has been a joint product of all services. This has been done for the double purpose of having a statement of fact that is beyond controversy, and to lay the foundation for the consideration of the critical comments and constructive suggestions that have followed.

To the present time 85 reports have been submitted which carry recommendations. Fifteen of these reports, most of which recommend constructive legislation, have already been sent to Congress, viz:

1. Outlines of organization of the Government. Submitted January 17, 1912 (published as H. Doc. 458).

12. Supplementary report on the centralization of the distribution of Government publications. Submitted April 4, 1912 (published in H. Doc. 670).
13. The use of outlines of organization of the Government. Submitted April 4, 1912 (published in H. Doc. 670).
14. Report on retirement of superannuated employees. Submitted May 6, 1912 (published as H. Doc. 732).
15. Report on "The Need for a National Budget." Submitted June 27, 1912 (published as H. Doc. 854).

The reports of the commission already submitted which call for Executive action relate to a variety of subjects. Included in these reports are recommendations: For the modification of orders and practices related to the administration of the civil-service laws; the installation of a uniform system of accounting and reporting; forms and instructions for the preparation and submission of a budget; the use of window envelopes; the introduction of labor-saving office devices; more economical Government housing; better lighting, heating, ventilation, and sanitation; the better utilization of waste; the more economical disposition of obsolete and condemned stores and other property; the discontinuance of the jurat in the preparation of claims for reimbursement; the promulgation of rules governing travel expenditures.

With respect to many of these affirmative action has been taken, but in nearly every case it is necessary to proceed slowly with the making of changes, which have already been ordered, as it necessarily requires months to make any change which broadly affects the service without causing so much confusion as to seriously interfere with the transaction of Government business.

On December 9 I transmitted the report of the commission, with its recommendations, on the organization and work of the Patent Office. This report is printed as House Document No. 1110. I am transmitting herewith 11 other reports, the recommendations contained in which have my approval, as follows:

1. Business methods of the office of The Adjutant General of the War Department.
2. The handling and filing of correspondence in the Mail and Record Division of the office of the Chief of Engineers.
3. The handling and filing of correspondence and the doing of statistical work in the Bureau of Insular Affairs.
4. The handling and filing of correspondence in the office of the Surgeon General.
5. The handling and filing of correspondence in the office of the Signal Corps.
6. The handling and filing of correspondence in the office of the Chief of Ordnance.
7. The handling and filing of correspondence in the Mail and Record Division of the Department of Justice.
8. Methods of keeping efficiency records of employees in the National Bank Redemption Agency of the Department of the Treasury.
9. Report on the electric lighting of Federal buildings of the Department of the Treasury.
10. On the establishment of an independent public health service.
11. The recovery of fiber stock of canceled paper money.

The first six of these reports have been the result of intensive study of methods employed in the offices of the War Department at Washington, which point to detail reductions in cost which may affect the appropriations for 1914. These, together with the recommendations of the Secretary of War, are sent for your information. In the opinion of the commission, an estimated saving of over $400,000 a year can ultimately be made by favorable action on the changes in methods which are recommended in the six offices of the War Department alone.

One report above listed relates to the question of personnel. This is important both in its relation to efficiency or organization and economy of work. A number of other reports, containing recommendations for changes in the details of methods which, in the opinion of the commission, will produce marked savings in annual cost of transacting the business of the offices investigated are in the hands of the services interested. These will be sent for the information of the Congress as soon as action has been taken or other conclusion has been reached.

The report on electric lighting of public buildings is significant of the inattention to administrative details in a subdivision of the service which is charged with the operation and maintenance of several hundred Government buildings. Until this inquiry was begun no attempt had been made in this office to find out what was even the gross expenditures for operation as distinct from maintenance, or capital outlays, either for each building or for the whole service, and there were no means provided for knowing the heating, lighting, cleaning, or other costs as subdivisions of operation. The head of the office was presumably interested in construction; the primary responsibility of the department was for the care and custody of funds; the result was that no attention was given to the development of the information essential to the central direction and control over operative services. And it may be said that the condition found in this office is typical of the condition found in many of the operative services. The report covers only a partial inquiry into lighting efficiency.

The report submitted relative to the recovery of fiber stock of canceled paper money proposes that the method of macerating this stock which has been in use for about 40 years be discontinued and that more modern methods be adopted. Under modern methods of treating this paper stock it is deinked and defibered with but a small loss of pulp, and such stock when recovered can be used in the manufacture of new money paper, at a saving, as compared with the present method of macerating and sale, of about $100,000 per annum.

While during the time and with the staff available it has not been possible to make final detailed reports on more than a few of the hundreds of offices at Washington, and in only one office outside of Washington has work of this character been undertaken, the reports which are submitted will serve to illustrate the character of results which may follow an extensive investigation of office technique and procedure. It is further to be noted that the offices which have been reported on are those which have been frequently under scrutiny. From what is known of the offices outside of Washington it is thought that it is in this field that the largest opportunities for economy will be found—partly due to the fact that these offices have not been brought under scrutiny, and partly due to the fact that a large number of them are dominated by political appointees.

As illustrating the relative importance of services outside of Washington, it is of interest to note that the cost of clerk hire at the New York post office alone is more than that incurred in the Departments of War, Navy, State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor at Washington; that in the customhouse at New York the cost of clerk hire is greater than in any one department at Washington.

In my opinion the technique and procedure of every branch and office of the Government should be submitted to the same painstaking examination as has been given to those on which reports have been made. To do this, however, ample funds must be provided. As stated in previous messages to Congress on the subject, there is no greater service that can be rendered to the country than that of the continuance of the work of the commission until some form of organization is provided for continuously doing this kind of work under the Executive. I have asked, therefore, that $250,000 be provided for the continuation of the investigation which has been so well begun, and that these funds be made available March 4. In my opinion this is not a matter in which the Congress should assume that public money will be unwisely spent. At a total cost of about $220,000 during the 21 months covered by the work of the commission, facts have been developed and recommendations have been made that, if followed up, will result in savings of millions of dollars each year. This has been done under the handicap of inadequate funds and uncertainty of continuation, which interfered with the making of plans which could not be completely executed within a few months. It would be very much to the advantage of the administration if the President were authorized to spend whatever amount he may deem to be necessary within the next two years, the only condition attached being that he render an account of expenditures.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1913.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that while this message asks for an appropriation, it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, inasmuch as it involves a variety of subjects; and unless there is objection——

Mr. MANN. Does it not refer only to an appropriation to be made by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations has handled the so-called Commission on Economy in the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

FUR SEALS (S. DOC. NO. 997).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

At the last session of Congress an act was adopted to give effect to the fur-seal treaty of July 7, 1911, between Great Britain, Japan, Russia, and the United States, in which act was incorporated a provision establishing a five-year period during which the killing of seals upon the Pribilof Islands is prohibited. Prior to the passage of this act, I pointed out in my message to Congress, on August 14 last, the inadvisability of adopting legislation the effect of which was to require this Government to suspend the killing of surplus male seals on land before it was actually proved by the test of experience and scientific investigation that such suspension of killing was necessary for the protection and preservation of the seal herd. I also pointed out in that message that the other Governments interested might justly complain if this Government by prohibiting all land killing should deprive them of their expected share of the skins taken on land, unless we can show by satisfactory evidence that this course was adopted as the result of changed conditions justifying a change in our previous attitude on the subject. As was then anticipated, the other parties interested have now objected to the suspension thus imposed on the ground that it is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the treaty, inasmuch as under existing conditions a substantial number of male seals not required for breeding purposes can be killed annually without detriment to the reproductive capacity of the herd. The same objection was raised by the other Governments interested under this convention while the bill was awaiting my signature, after its passage by Congress, but I refrained from vetoing it because at that time several thousand sealskins had already been taken on the islands and were ready for distribution in accordance with the requirements of the treaty, so that the suspension of land killing would not actually become effective until the following year, and I was satisfied that the information resulting from a study of the condition of the herd during the past summer would put this Government in possession of facts which would either lead to the amendment of the act at this session of Congress, or enable this Government to justify a temporary suspension of land killing; and apart from this particular provision the act was needed to give effect to our treaty obligations.

It now appears that under the operation of the fur-seal convention during the past year the condition and size of the herd has improved to an extent which seems to indicate that there is now no necessity, and therefore no justification, for the suspension of all land killing of male seals, as required by the act under consideration.

Last season's reports from the officials in charge on the Pribilof Islands show that the herd, which the year before contained at the highest estimate not more than 140,000 seals, now numbers upward of 215,000 by actual count, showing in one season an increase of at least 75,000 seals. This increase is largely due to the protection afforded by the treaty to the breeding female seals, which last summer numbered nearly 82,000, many thousands of which, except for the treaty, would have been slaughtered by pelagic sealers, and as every breeding female adds one pup to the herd each year, over 81,000 new pups were added last season. Moreover, instead of losing 10,000 or 15,000 of these pups through starvation, as heretofore, on account of the slaughter of the nursing mothers by pelagic sealers, this summer by actual count the number of dead pups found on the rookeries was only 1,060.

It is evident from these reports that there has been a very remarkable increase in the size of the herd in one season under the operation of this convention and that a large part of this increase consists of female seals, upon which the future increase of the herd depends.

The present condition of the herd shows that there will be about 100,000 breeding female seals in the herd next summer, each one of which will produce one pup, and in the following year the female pups born last summer, amounting in accordance with the laws of nature to one-half of the total number of the year's pups, will pass into the breeding class, subject to losses from natural mortality, thus adding a possible 40,000 more, which would bring the total up in the neighborhood of 140,000 breeding female seals; and so on from year to year the reproductive strength of the herd will increase in almost geometrical progression, so that we can confidently count on having the present size of the herd doubled and trebled within a very short period.

All that is required to fulfill these expectations is to protect absolutely the female seals and set aside an adequate number of male seals for breeding purposes. The protection and preservation of the herd does not require the protection and preservation of the surplus male seals not needed for breeding purposes. Owing to the polygamous habits of the seals, the increase in the number of these surplus bachelor seals can in no conceivable way increase the birth rate or the reproductive capacity of the herd. Seals of this class contribute nothing to the welfare of the herd, and in some ways they are a distinct detriment as a disturbing element on the rookeries and as consumers of food, which is bound to become scarcer as the size of the herd increases. These nonbreeding males, therefore, are of no value as members of the herd except to furnish skins for the market in place of those heretofore taken by pelagic sealers, and in this connection it should be noted that the value of their skins for commercial purposes diminishes after they are 4 years old and ceases altogether after the age of 5 or 6.

It is right and necessary that the killing of all seals in the herd other than the nonbreeding males should be absolutely prohibited not only for five years but forever. Land killing has been and always must be strictly limited by law to male seals, so that female seals would never be included in land killing in any event. Pelagic sealing, on the other hand, always has been chiefly directed against female seals, thus diminishing the size of the herd not merely by the number actually killed each year, but also by an equal number of nursing pups killed by starvation and by the loss of the countless number of unborn pups which would have been added to the herd the following year and in succeeding years. Pelagic sealing has now been stopped, but it must be remembered that the United States alone was powerless to stop it. An international agreement was necessary for that purpose, and has at last been secured after difficult and protracted negotiations resulting in the present convention with Great Britain, Japan, and Russia, who have now joined with us in prohibiting pelagic sealing, and whose cooperation is necessary to make that prohibition effective. To secure such an agreement has been the aim of the United States throughout the entire period covered by the fur-seal controversy, and from the point of view of the United States this prohibition against pelagic sealing is the most important feature of the present convention. In order, however, to secure its adoption by Great Britain and Japan it was necessary for the United States to agree to give each of them a share of the proceeds of the annual increase of the American herd with the assurance, as an inducement, that a large annual increase available for commercial purposes would result from the abandonment of pelagic sealing. As stated in my former message to Congress on this subject—

> Ever since the question of land killing of seals was subjected to scientific investigation, soon after the fur-seal controversy arose, nearly 25 years ago, this Government has invariably insisted throughout the protracted and almost continuous diplomatic negotiations which have ensued for the settlement of this controversy that the progressive diminution of the herd was due to the killing of seals at sea, and that if pelagic sealing was discontinued the polygamous habits of the seals would make it possible to kill annually on land a large number of surplus males without detriment to the reproductive capacity of the herd and without interfering with the normal growth of the size of the herd. The position thus taken by the United States has always been put forward and relied on by the United States in urging that an international agreement should be entered into prohibiting pelagic sealing; and it is obvious that one of the considerations which induced Great Britain and Japan to enter into this convention prohibiting their subjects from pelagic sealing was the expectation that the position thus taken by the United States was well founded and that the skins falling to the share of those Governments from the land killing of seals, as provided for in this convention, would compensate them for abandoning the taking of sealskins at sea.

It was well understood by all the parties in entering into this convention that the result aimed at was to increase the annual reproductive capacity of the herd so that a larger number of sealskins might be taken each year for commercial purposes without injury to the welfare of the herd.

It is evident from these considerations that the United States is in honor bound under this convention to permit the killing annually for commercial purposes of male seals not required as a reserve for breeding before they have passed beyond the age when their skins cease to have a commercial value.

The question of how many male seals should be reserved each year for breeding purposes can readily be determined. In the act under consideration, as it passed the House and before it was amended in the Senate, there was a provision that hereafter only 3-year-old males shall be killed, and that there shall be reserved from among the finest and most perfect seals of that age not fewer than 2,000 in 1913, 2,500 in 1914, 3,000 in 1915, 3,500 in 1916, and 4,000 each year from 1917 to 1921, inclusive, and 5,000 each year thereafter during the continuance of the convention. These figures were arrived at after full and careful investigation by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and it appears from the committee reports accompanying this act that these figures were intended to be and were regarded as large enough to be on the safe side. It would be more appropriate and convenient to leave the decision of this question to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, subject to the limitation, which might properly be imposed, that each year before any commercial killing is done there should be marked and set aside or reserved from among the finest and best of the males of 3 years of age such number as is necessary, in his judgment, to provide an ample breeding reserve of males. In any event it is evident that the determination of the number of male seals to be reserved each year for this purpose will present no difficulty; and in this connection it should be noted, as stated in my former message on this subject, that—> since the fur-seal business has been taken over by the Government and no private interests are now concerned in making a profit out of it, there is no urgent necessity for imposing by legislation stringent limitations upon land killing.

The only provision in the convention authorizing the United States to limit or suspend land killing is the reservation in article 10, that nothing therein contained shall restrict the right of the United States at any time and from time to time to suspend altogether the taking of sealskins on its islands and to impose such restrictions and regulations upon the total number of skins to be taken in any season, and the manner and times and places of taking them, "as may seem necessary to protect and preserve the seal herd or to increase its number." It is clear from the terms of the convention that the right thus reserved to the United States to regulate or suspend land killing is not an arbitrary right, but can be exercised only when necessary to protect or preserve or increase the herd. It is also clear that this provision must be read in connection with the main purpose of the convention, and that the right reserved should be exercised in aid of that purpose. It has already been shown that the result aimed at by this convention was to increase the annual reproductive capacity of the herd, so that a larger number of sealskins might be taken each year for commercial purposes without injury to the welfare of the herd. It follows, therefore, that when a limitation or suspension of land killing would interfere with, rather than promote, this purpose of the convention there would then be not only no necessity but no justification for such limitation or suspension.

The argument has been advanced that in addition to the right thus reserved the convention recognized an absolute right in the United States arbitrarily to suspend all land killing, because, according to this argument, another clause of the convention fixes a measure of damages to be paid each year to the other parties whenever the United States prohibits all land killing. The clause referred to is found in Article XI, which provides that in case the United States shall absolutely prohibit all land killing of seals, then it shall pay to Great Britain and Japan each the sum of $10,000 annually in lieu of their share of skins during the years when no killing is allowed. It is evident, however, from an examination of the other provisions of the same clause of the convention that these $10,000 payments can not be, and were not intended to be, regarded as a measure of damages, because Great Britain and Japan are required to repay them to the United States with interest at 4 per cent out of the proceeds of their share of the skins taken whenever land killing is resumed. A payment which is subsequently to be refunded clearly is not a measure of damages. Moreover, even if this provision could be regarded as fixing a measure of damages, that in itself would not justify the United States in arbitrarily imposing those damages upon Great Britain and Japan. These provisions requiring the $10,000 payments to be made when land killing is suspended and to be refunded when killing is resumed clearly have an ulterior purpose; otherwise they are wholly unnecessary, for the same result would have been accomplished with much greater simplicity by omitting them altogether. The ulterior purpose becomes perfectly clear when we consider that under the laws in force when the treaty was made it was within the power of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to suspend land killing altogether whenever, in his opinion, the welfare of the herd required such action. The evident purpose, therefore, of this requirement for making substantial payments when land killing was suspended, was to prevent the suspension of land killing by executive action unless Congress was prepared to appropriate the money necessary for making such payments. It was undoubtedly assumed that the necessity for adopting legislation appropriating the money to make these payments would lead to a careful investigation of whether or not the actual condition of the herd warranted a total suspension of land killing, and that the appropriation would not be made unless the investigation produced satisfactory evidence that such suspension of killing was absolutely necessary within the requirements of the treaty.

In view of the present condition of the herd and the very marked increase in its size and particularly in the number of female seals, which has resulted from the operation of this convention during a single year, and which, as above shown, is to be attributed almost wholly to the protection afforded by the prohibition against pelagic sealing, I recommend to Congress the immediate consideration of whether or not the complete suspension of land killing imposed by this act is now necessary for the protection and preservation of the herd, and for increasing its number within the meaning and for the purposes of the convention. If no actual necessity is found for such suspension, then it is not justified under the convention, and the act should be amended accordingly.

As stated in my annual message to Congress in December last, it is important that in case there is any uncertainty as to the real necessity for suspending all land killing, this Government should yield on that point rather than give the slightest ground for the charge that we have been in anyway remiss in observing our treaty obligations. I also wish to impress upon Congress that, as stated in my former message on this subject, it is essential in dealing with it not only to fulfill the obligations imposed upon the United States by the letter and the spirit of the convention, but also to consider the interests of the other parties to the convention, for their cooperation is necessary to make it an effective and permanent settlement of the fur-seal controversy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been laid before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will wait.

Mr. REED. As a matter of inquiry, does this take precedence of the order of morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule of the Senate is that a conference report is always in order, except while the Journal is being read, while the Senate is dividing, and one or two other exceptions. It is in order now.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Kansas yield long enough to permit the introduction of a bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has not yet been reached. There are several other orders before the introduction of bills.

Mr. REED. I understand, then, that that order will come, but I thought the Senator from Kansas intended to call up a matter for discussion.

Mr. CURTIS. It will take no time, I will state to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Petitions and memorials are in order. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, last Monday I asked unanimous consent that the bill to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up next Monday. Objection was made on account of the fact that the impeachment trial would take up most of this week and that there would not be time for discussion of the measure. Then on Tuesday I made the same request, making the date one week later, which would be January 20. It was proposed that it should not interfere with appropriation bills. It was also suggested that at that particular time there were not enough Senators in the Chamber to give the request proper consideration.

I now make the same request, with the proviso that it is not to interfere with appropriation bills. I wish to say in this connection that since I brought the matter up on last Tuesday we have been able to determine about when the impeachment trial will be concluded, and that this request, if granted, will still leave one week for a discussion of this bill after the conclusion of the impeachment trial. I therefore send to the desk, Mr. President, the following request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the following order, which will be reported by the Secretary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read. Senators ask that it be read.

Mr. REED. Under what order are we proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are proceeding under the order of petitions and memorials; but the Chair understands that the Senator from Tennessee is requesting unanimous consent——

Mr. REED. Is that in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is in order, by unanimous consent, but that it could not be put, out of order, in the event of a single objection.

Mr. REED. The time of the Senate has been consumed this morning by the reading of messages from the President of the United States, and there are some bills that I want to introduce and I think that this request is not in order at this time. I think the only thing that is in order at this time is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. SANDERS. I understand it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that it is in order for a Senator to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of any matter.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose a request for unanimous consent is equivalent to asking for an order of the Senate, and it would come in under the last order of business—the morning hour—would it not? It would come in legitimately and could not be kept out by a single objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair was that unanimous consent could be asked at any time.

Mr. LODGE. That is possible at any time, I agree, but it would be in order at this time regularly under the last order of morning business.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask that this order be read and that unanimous consent be given to place it before the body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed order presented by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order that the request itself at this time is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. REED. To state my point, under this order of business you can no more ask unanimous consent to take up a particular bill than you can do any other thing which does not come under the head of the presentation of petitions and memorials. This is not a petition or a memorial. The Senator could ask unanimous consent to set aside the order of business, but that is not what he is asking. He is asking unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill at a particular time.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor and is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. SANDERS. My point of order is that the Chair has already ruled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had ruled. The Secretary will report the request.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the consent asked for by the Senator from Tennessee. Are there further——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to present certain petitions.

Mr. NELSON. We have a right to hear the request read, because we have a right to determine whether the objection is good or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary was about to report the request, which was verbally stated by the Senator from Tennessee. If there is demand for it, the Secretary will report the request that is made in writing.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate concurrent resolution 34, for the printing of 25,000 copies of the Judicial Code, to report it with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the omnibus claims bill at the close of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to carry out the order of the Senate, which is that at 1 o'clock it will reconvene as a Court of Impeachment.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) took the chair and announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last sitting of the Senate for the consideration of the articles of impeachment.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, January 8, 1913, when sitting as a court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved. Mr. Manager HOWLAND has the floor.

Mr. Manager HOWLAND resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

ARGUMENT OF MR. HOWLAND, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager HOWLAND. Mr. President, I shall proceed immediately to submit for the consideration of the Senate certain propositions of law. The questions of fact will be discussed by my colleagues.

The managers contend that the power to impeach is properly invoked to remove a Federal judge whenever, by reason of misbehavior, misconduct, malconduct, or maladministration, the judge has demonstrated his unfitness to continue in office; that misbehavior on the part of a Federal judge is a violation of the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, and a violation also of his oath of office taken in compliance with the requirements of the statute law. If the Senate should adopt this view of the law, then the only question to be passed on by the Senate would be whether the acts alleged and proven constitute such misbehavior as to render the respondent unfit to continue in office.

In supporting our view of the law I shall first call attention to the issue of law directly raised by the pleadings; second, to the proper construction to be placed upon certain sections of the Constitution; and, third, to the precedents, both State and Federal.

The respondent, in answer to each one of the articles of impeachment filed against him in paragraph 1 thereof, uses the following language:

> That the said article does not set forth anything which, if true, constitutes an impeachable offense or a high crime or misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that, therefore, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment should not further entertain the charge contained in said article.

It will be noticed that in the first paragraph of his several answers to the various counts the respondent has really interposed what may properly be designated as a general demurrer to each and every article presented against him, and that by paragraph 2 of the answer to each article the respondent pleads by way of confession and avoidance, substantially admitting the acts charged and attempting to avoid by denying wrongful intent.

The replication interposed by the managers is a joinder in demurrer and a traverse of the new matter in the plea, so that the record in this case produces an issue of law and an issue of fact to be passed upon by the Senate at the same time. I can only account for this condition of affairs by presuming that counsel for the respondent had very little confidence in the issue of law raised by his general demurrer and therefore did not dare press it for decision before going to trial on the merits.

In the consideration of this case, if the Senate should decide that the demurrer interposed by the respondent ought to be sustained, that would terminate the inquiry, and it would, of course, be unnecessary to pass upon the issue of fact. Under the general allegation of the respondent's demurrer attacking the sufficiency in law of the various articles it was impossible to determine the exact ground upon which the respondent relied. Learned counsel for the respondent, however, in his opening statement to the Senate, which he has since amplified in his brief, used the following language:

> So we mean that what was a crime at the common law may be made impeachable here, and that any laws which Congress has passed since that time, if violated by any civil officer of the Government, judge, or President, or anyone else, may be the subject of impeachment, and that there can be no other impeachable offenses.

In that statement we are advised for the first time of the exact ground upon which counsel for the respondent intends to attack the sufficiency in law of the articles of impeachment, viz, that they charge no indictable offense at common law or under the Federal statutes. He thus raises once more the question which has been discussed in almost every proceeding of this character, whether Federal or State. This contention is entitled to our respectful consideration on account of its age, if for no other reason. Time and time again it has been urged, only to be disregarded by the various courts of impeachment, as we shall show by the authorities cited later.

The learned counsel for the respondent, by interposing his demurrer to the sufficiency of the articles and insisting that only indictable offenses are impeachable, would seem to be placing himself in the position of holding that the object of impeachment was punishment to the individual. This conception of the object of impeachment is entirely erroneous, and whatever injury may result to the individual is purely incidental and not one of the objects of impeachment in any sense. An impeachment proceeding is the exercise of a power which the people delegated to their representatives to protect them from injury at the hands of their own servants and to purify the public service. The sole object of impeachment is to relieve the people in the future, either from the improper discharge of official functions or from the discharge of official functions by an improper person. This view of impeachment is clearly demonstrated by the judgment which the Constitution authorizes in case of conviction and which shall extend no further than removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States, leaving the punishment of the individual for any crime he may have committed to the criminal court. (See Art. I, sec. 3, par. 7, Constitution of the United States.)

As bearing upon the question of law raised by the demurrer of the respondent I wish to call attention to two provisions of the Federal Constitution. Section 4, Article II, provides:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors—

To which I shall hereafter refer as the removal section, and section 1, Article III, the second sentence thereof, which provides that—

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

To which I shall hereafter refer as the judicial-tenure section.

It will be noted that the removal section immediately precedes the judicial-tenure section. The limitation of the judicial tenure to good behavior is the only limitation of that character to be found in the Federal Constitution upon the tenure of any of the civil officers of the Government. I therefore contend that it was the plain intention of the framers of the Constitution that, in so far as the Federal judges were concerned, the removal section was not intended to be antagonistic in its terms to the judicial-tenure section, immediately following it, and that the judicial-tenure section, which provides that the judicial term shall be during good behavior, was not intended to be antagonistic to the removal section, which immediately precedes it. These two sections must be construed together, and when so construed the judicial-tenure section is of necessity either an addition to the enumerated offenses in the removal section or a definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," when applied to the judiciary, as including misbehavior. To say that the judicial tenure shall be limited to good behavior in one section of the Federal Constitution and then contend that the section of the Constitution immediately preceding that has destroyed its force and effect and has left the Federal Government without any machinery to pass upon the question of the forfeiture of the judicial tenure, or to take jurisdiction of acts which constitute misbehavior but are not criminal, is to treat the words "during good behavior" as surplusage. Such an interpretation violates all rules of construction.

THE LEGAL STATUS OF THE JUDICIAL TENURE.

What is the legal status of the judicial tenure and what determines that status? There are some considerations on which to base the claim that the legal status of the judicial tenure should be determined by the same principles that are applicable to a contract of hiring. The parties to the contract are the people of the United States and the candidate for a Federal judgeship. When he has been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate the commission tendered or delivered to him is an offer on the part of the people of the United States to the candidate, whereby they agree to enter into a contract on certain terms and conditions with the candidate and offer to pay him a fixed sum of money for the performance of certain services for them in accordance with the terms of the offer. No obligation on the part of the Government has yet attached; the candidate need not accept the offer; he is not compelled to qualify; that is a voluntary act on his part. (See Marberry v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137.)

Section 257 of the judicial code provides that the Federal judges shall take a certain prescribed oath before they proceed to perform the duties of their respective offices.

The acceptance of the offer on the part of the candidate is evidenced by his oath, and when the oath is taken the contract of hiring becomes valid and binding on the parties to the same in accordance with the terms and conditions of the contract.

In this case the contracts between the United States and the respondent are evidenced by the various commissions and the various oaths accepting the same. The contract between the United States and the respondent as a circuit judge is evidenced by the commission bearing date the 31st day of January, 1911, in the words and figures following, to wit:

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that reposing special trust and confidence in the wisdom, uprightness, and learning of Robert Wodrow Archbald, of Pennsylvania, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Robert Wodrow Archbald, during his good behavior. Appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and hereby designated to serve for four years in the Commerce Court.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the Department of Justice to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 31st day of January, A. D. 1911, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-fifth.

[SEAL.] WM. H. TAFT.

By the President:

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

The oath of office bears date the 1st day of February, 1911, in the words and figures following, to wit:

I, Robert Wodrow Archbald, do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and designated to serve for four years in the Commerce Court, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

R. W. ARCHBALD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of February, 1911.

[SEAL.] E. R. W. SEARLE,
Clerk District Court.

Under this state of facts, if we were not dealing with the Government as one of the parties to the contract, under constitutional limitations the contract could be abrogated for breach of condition if necessary and the rights of the parties determined in the courts of law.

If it should be objected that the legal status of the judicial tenure must be placed on a higher ground than an ordinary contract right by reason of the solemnities necessary to create the status and by reason of the important and sacred functions of government with which the judge is charged, we perhaps would be justified in saying that a fiduciary relation of the highest and most sacred character known to the law is created by the commission of appointment and the oath of acceptance of a Federal judge. Under this conception of the status of the judicial tenure the judge is acting as a trustee. The subject matter of the trust is the judicial power of the United States, and the beneficiaries of the trust are the people thereof. Given this status in a court of equity, the trustee, under well-known and well-recognized principles of equitable jurisprudence, can always be removed on application of the beneficiary and a showing that the trustee is not performing his duties as such trustee in such a manner as to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor that he is acting for the best interest of the beneficiary. Realizing, however, the manifest impropriety of leaving the question of forfeiting the judicial tenure to the judges, the framers of the Constitution wisely provided a different forum, viz, the Congress to raise and try the question of the forfeiture. We have now seen that whether we apply principles of law or equity to the status created by the appointment of the Federal judge there would be a forum to adjudicate the rights of the parties, and reasoning by analogy we are driven to the conclusion that the framers of the Constitution were not unmindful of the importance of the subject with which they were dealing, and intended to and did provide a forum before which the people of the United States could bring their judges and on proper showing of misbehavior, which demonstrates the unfitness of the judge to continue in office, work a forfeiture of the judicial tenure.

HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

In the removal section of the Constitution we find the words "high crimes and misdemeanors." These words are used in the same sense that had attached to them for centuries in the impeachment trials of England. They were used as part of the well-recognized terminology of the law of Parliament as distinguished from the common law. We must bear in mind that these terms are used in a section of the Constitution which is plainly intended to protect the state against its own servants.

The two enumerated offenses of treason and bribery are offenses peculiarly against the state as distinguished from offenses against the individual. In construing a clause of this character in the Constitution where the whole object is to protect and preserve the Government, such a construction should be placed upon the language used as will best accomplish the results desired. To insist that the technical definition of the criminal law should be applied in construing the meaning of the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to insist on the narrowest possible construction, and loses sight of the object and purpose of this clause in the Constitution. To insist that it is impossible to impeach a judge unless he has committed some indictable offense is to say that the people of this country are powerless to remove a Federal judge so long as he is able to keep out of jail. While no criminal is fit to exercise the judicial function, it does not follow that all other persons are fit to be judges. Such a construction is absolutely repulsive to reason and ought not to be and is not a correct interpretation of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Attention is often called to the discussion that took place in the Constitutional Convention between Col. Mason and Mr. Madison in which Mr. Madison suggested that the term "maladministration" was too vague and the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was adopted. Attention was called to that by the distinguished counsel for the respondent in his opening statement.

On the strength of this passage in Madison's papers it is contended that Mr. Madison did not construe the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" as including maladministration. (3 Madison's Papers, 1528.)

We find, however, that Mr. Madison in a speech in Congress on the 16th day of June, 1789, on the bill to establish a department of foreign affairs, in discussing the possibility of abuse of power by the Executive, said:

Perhaps the great danger of abuse in the Executive's power lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this, for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him and the Senate can remove him, whether the President chooses or not. The danger then consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by the House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration, for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. (4 Elliot's Debates, 375.)

This language clearly demonstrates that Mr. Madison believed that acts of maladministration which were not indictable were impeachable.

Nowhere in the English law of impeachment or in the Constitution of the United States or any of the States do we find any definition of impeachable offenses. The language of the Federal Constitution attempts no definition of impeachable offenses, and the general term "high crimes and misdemeanors" is not and was not intended to be a definition.

Under the State constitutions we sometimes find the added terms "mal and corrupt conduct," "corruption in office," and "maladministration," all general terms without attempting any technical definition. The reason for this is perfectly obvious, and is that the subject matter is not capable of technical definition. Who is wise enough to anticipate every manifestation of fraud that would give a chancellor jurisdiction and write it into a statute? It is the effect of acts under the circumstances of each particular case that confers jurisdiction. So it is with impeachments. No one can tell in advance in what way or from what source the danger may arise which demands the exercise of this power. The power of impeachment is recognized and authorized in every one of our constitutions, Federal and State, but the circumstances which warrant the exercise of that power are not defined and the necessity for its exercise is in the first instance left to the discretion of the House of Representatives. It is an indefinite and broad power incident to sovereignty, and its exercise in this country is demanded whenever the agents of sovereignty have acted in such a manner as to destroy their efficiency in the discharge of their duties to the sovereign. The existence of this power is necessary to the permanence of the State, and the exercise of the power is necessary whenever and however the welfare of the State may be threatened by its civil officers.

I wish at this point to submit for the consideration of the Senate the record in certain State trials of impeachments, with particular reference to their holdings on the question of whether the acts of a judge must be indictable to be impeachable, and then to make a very brief reference to the trials before the Senate of the United States.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF ALEXANDER ADDISON, ESQ., PRESIDENT OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS IN THE CIRCUIT CONSISTING OF WESTMORELAND, FAYETTE, WASHINGTON, AND ALLEGHENY COUNTIES, IN THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON AN IMPEACHMENT BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BEFORE THE SENATE IN THE YEAR 1803.

The constitution of the State of Pennsylvania of 1790 governed this proceeding, and section 3 of article 4 of said constitution is the impeachment section thereof and provides that all civil officers of the Commonwealth shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office.

Section 2 of article 5 of that constitution provides that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior, but for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature.

In the year 1801 the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania filed a motion in the supreme court of the State asking leave to file an information against Judge Addison, on the ground of misbehavior on the same state of facts as subsequently alleged in the articles. The supreme court refused to grant the motion because the affidavit did not charge a crime and intimated that there was another remedy applicable to that state of facts. And thereafter the house of representatives preferred articles of impeachment against Judge Addison, alleging that he had obstructed the free, impartial, and due administration of justice, contrary to the public rights and interests of the Commonwealth. (See Addison's trial, pp. 16–69, 151–154.)

The charge, in substance, amounted to a usurpation of power in preventing an associate judge from addressing the grand jury.

The plea interposed by Judge Addison was not guilty.

Mr. Dallas appeared for the managers, and Judge Addison conducted his own defense, and strenuously insisted that the allegations in the articles of impeachment did not charge an indictable offense, which was true.

He was, however, convicted by a vote of 20 to 4. The sentence was that Alexander Addison, president of the several courts of common pleas in the fifth district of this State, shall be, and he is hereby, removed from his office of president aforesaid, and also is disqualified to hold and exercise the office of judge in any court of law within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS OF EDWARD SHIPPEN, CHIEF JUSTICE, JASPER YEATES AND THOMAS SMITH, ASSOCIATE JUSTICES, OF THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON AN IMPEACHMENT BEFORE THE SENATE OF THE COMMONWEALTH, 1805.

Articles of impeachment were presented against these judges of the supreme court, because they adjudged Thomas Passmore guilty of a contempt of court and sent him to jail for 30 days and fined him $50.

It would seem to be clear that the act charged against the judges was not an indictable offense, and yet this question was not even raised by distinguished counsel for the judges, the chief of whom was that great lawyer, Mr. Dallas.

The judges were acquitted on the merits.

IN THE MATTER OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS RELATIVE TO THE IMPEACHMENT OF JAMES PRESCOTT, JUDGE OF PROBATE OF THE COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX, 1821.

This proceeding was had under the constitution of 1780. Article 8 of section 2, chapter 1, authorized the senate to hear and determine all impeachments made by the house of representatives against any officer of the Commonwealth for misconduct and maladministration in their offices. The constitution also provides that all judicial officers shall hold their offices during good behavior, and also provides for removal by the governor, with consent of the council, upon the address of both houses of the legislature.

Under this constitution it would seem that a majority vote was sufficient to convict.

February 5, 1821, the house presented 13 articles of impeachment at the bar of the senate. Article 3 charged that Judge Prescott held court at his law office and not in any probate court and granted letters of administration and warrants of appraisal for property and collected greater fees than the law allowed.

Article 12 charged the judge with advising a guardian and collecting a fee of $5 therefor, and allowing the charge in the account of the guardian as a proper charge against the estate for attorney fees.

From the answer of the respondent it appears that the difficulty arose out of a dispute as to the right to collect fees for certain services.

I feel justified in calling this case to the attention of the Senate because of the fact that Daniel Webster appeared for the respondent and Lemuel Shaw appeared as one of the managers on the part of the house. Of course, neither one of the acts alleged in these counts was indictable.

It was contended by Mr. Webster that the charge must be the breach of some known and standing law, the violation of some positive duty, and the power to impeach for other than indictable offenses was thoroughly discussed. Mr. Lemuel Shaw, in supporting the articles, said:

Some difference of opinion may arise as to the true construction and effect of these words "misconduct and maladministration in office" as they stand in the constitution, proceeding probably from the ambiguity and want of technical precision in the words themselves and probably from their connection with the other words in the same paragraph. The latter clause provides that the parties so convicted on impeachment shall be, nevertheless, liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and conviction according to the laws of the land. Perhaps the most reasonable construction of these provisions in the constitution taken together is that proceedings by impeachment and by indictment are had allo intuitu, designed and intended for distinct purposes, the one to punish the officer and the other the citizen. It is obvious that a person in official station is bound in common with all other citizens to obey the laws of the land, and is answerable to the ordinary tribunals for any violation of them. But the constitution establishes a broad and marked distinction between official delinquencies and offenses against social duty. Criminal acts, therefore, may be committed by an officer of such a nature as to render him liable to indictment and punishment in the courts of justice and at the same time being an obvious violation of his official duty and may render him liable to impeachment. Again, other acts may be supposed which, as breaches of the laws, would render an officer liable to indictment and punishment, but which do not in any way affect his official character and duty and would not render him liable to impeachment. The position is equally sound that acts may be committed by a public officer in direct violation of his official duty which would amount to misconduct and maladministration in office within the intent of the constitution, and which would consequently render the officer liable to impeachment, and of such a nature that the ordinary tribunals would not take notice of and punish them in their usual course of procedure and according to the laws of the land, for which, therefore, the offender would not be indictable. If this construction be true, an act may be punished both by indictment and impeachment, or the one or the other exclusively, according to its nature and circumstances.

Judge Prescott was found guilty on article 3 by a vote of 16 to 9, and on article 12 by a vote of 19 to 6, and was removed from office. (See Prescott's trial, pp. 7, 165, 180.)

Mr. Manager HOWLAND, continuing his argument, said:

Last evening I was addressing myself to the proposition that indictability was not a condition precedent to impeachability, and I had called the attention of the Senate to two leading State cases—that of Judge Alexander Addison in Pennsylvania in 1803 and that of Judge James Prescott in Massachusetts in 1821. Continuing the citation of precedents in support of the proposition laid down I now call the attention of the Senate to the case of Judge George G. Barnard, justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York in 1872.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF GEORGE G. BARNARD, JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, 1872.

In connection with this case I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the constitution of New York the judges of the court of appeals sat as members of the impeachment court together with the senate.

Judge George G. Barnard, justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, was impeached by the house of representatives, who presented 38 articles of impeachment, and the thirty-seventh article contained 15 specifications thereunder.

The allegations in the various counts are all charged as mal and corrupt conduct, and several of the counts extend or relate to transactions occurring during a previous term of office, to which counts the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, claiming that he could not be held accountable in this proceeding for acts done during the previous term. The court, however, overruled his plea by a vote of 23 to 9, holding that he could be held as a matter of law for acts done during a previous term.

A careful review of the acts alleged as mal and corrupt conduct in this case will disclose that none of the allegations would sustain an indictment.

I am unable to find in the constitution of 1846 and the amendments thereto in force at the time of this trial any enumeration of the grounds for the impeachment of judges. The constitution of 1821, article 5, section 2, provided that the assembly should have power of impeaching all civil officers of the State for mal and corrupt conduct in office and for high crimes and misdemeanors. I take it, however, that the adoption of the constitution of 1846 absolutely abrogated the constitution of 1821, so that in the Barnard trial, while they used the language of the constitution of 1821 and charged mal and corrupt conduct in office, that language has no constitutional force and effect in the proceedings and was simply descriptive of those acts which the house of representatives believed to be impeachable.

The same old question of power to impeach for other than indictable offenses was argued very thoroughly. Mr. Van Cott in presenting the case for the managers, on page 243 of volume 1, makes a statement of the test which should be applied in the proceeding, and which was subsequently applied in my judgment by the court.

Now, I have stated some of the general principles applicable to this case. I have stated a few of the orders, and it is now for this court, sitting, to define judicial good behavior and judicial bad behavior; to make the precedent which shall govern in all the future and make our future clear or make it anything but clear to us; to say that the conduct of the judge in these cases is lawful conduct, is good behavior, and sanction it as a safe and lawful precedent, or whether the court will condemn it and will say that there shall not be infused into the civilization and into the judicature of this State the morals of the Barbary coast and of the Spanish Main, for these proceedings were as mere buccaneering and lawless expeditions against persons and property as were ever pursued by pirates upon the high seas.

I would like particularly to call the attention of the Senate to article 37 and the specifications thereunder, which charges respondent with deporting himself in a manner unseemly and indecorous, using language coarse, obscene, and indecent, and using the process of the court to aid and benefit his friends and favoring suitors and counsel, and treating counsel in a coarse, indecent, arbitrary, tyrannical manner, and was guilty of conduct unbecoming the high position which he held, tending to bring the administration of justice into contempt and disgrace. These general allegations are laid more definitely in the specifications which follow.

It is perfectly apparent from the reading of these allegations that no indictable offense is charged, yet the court, by a vote of 24 to 11, found the respondent guilty under the thirty-seventh article.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF SHERMAN PAGE, A JUDGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT IN AND FOR THE COUNTY OF MOWER, STATE OF MINNESOTA, 1878.

Ten articles of impeachment were presented by the house of representatives and tried before the senate, charging malicious, arbitrary, and tyrannical use of power, and citing specific instances of the same.

Under the constitution of Minnesota judges were impeachable for corrupt conduct in office or for crimes and misdemeanors.

Article 5 charged that the said Sherman Page needlessly, maliciously, and unlawfully, with intent thereby to foment disturbance among the inhabitants of said county of Mower, and with further intent to insult and humiliate one George Baird, then sheriff of said county, issued two orders or commands to the sheriff, in substance directing him to quell riots and preserve the peace, and threatening him in case he disobeyed.

On June 5, 1878, Hon. Cushman K. Davis, counsel for the respondent, moved to quash article 5, saying:

The senate will perceive that we provided in the first sentence of our answer to article 5 that the article is insufficient in law of itself and charges no crime. For those reasons, whether a motion to quash be designated in that way or whether it is bringing a demurrer to the sufficiency of that article or whether it is a demurrer to proof is immaterial. I ask that this article may be dismissed from the consideration of the senate and from our own. (See Page trial, p. 623, 1st vol.)

The question being taken on the motion to quash, it was defeated by a vote of 21 to 15, and by that action of the senate was held good in law, although it did not charge a crime.

On the merits of the case judgment of acquittal was entered.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE HON. E. ST. JULIEN COX, JUDGE OF THE NINTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA, BEFORE THE SENATE OF MINNESOTA AS A HIGH COURT OF IMPEACHMENT, 1882.

The constitution of Minnesota provided for the impeachment of judges for corrupt conduct in office or high crimes and misdemeanors in office. The house of representatives preferred a long list of articles of impeachment, charging specific instances of intoxication and averring that the use of intoxicating liquors had rendered the judge incompetent and unable to discharge the duties of said office with decency and decorum, faithfully and impartially, to the great disgrace of the administration of public justice, and so forth, by reason whereof he was guilty of misbehavior in office and of crimes and misdemeanors in office.

It will be noted that the acts alleged are not charged in the exact language of the constitution, but the allegation is that the respondent was guilty of misbehavior in office and of crimes and misdemeanors rather than of corrupt conduct in office and of crimes and misdemeanors, which is the language of the Minnesota constitution. To these articles of impeachment the respondent interposed a demurrer attacking their sufficiency in law. This demurrer was overruled to all of the articles except to article 19, which was sustained.

The respondent thereafter pleaded to the merits, and trial was had and he was found guilty of misbehavior in office and of crimes and misdemeanors in office on seven of the articles, and was removed from the office of district judge of the State of Minnesota and disqualified for and during the full period of three years to hold the office of judge of the district court of the State of Minnesota and of all other judicial offices of honor, trust, or profit in the State for the period of three years from the date of the judgment.

At the time of these proceedings drunkenness was not an indictable offense in the State of Minnesota, although there has since been passed a law making drunkenness an indictable offense.

IMPEACHMENT TRIALS IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF SENATOR WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Coming now to the impeachment trials before the Senate of the United States, the first case is that of Senator William Blount, in 1799, who was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, but the acts charged were not indictable. The case turned on the question of whether or not a Senator was a civil officer of the United States, but the power of impeachment was ably discussed in the argument.

Mr. Jared Ingersoll, of counsel for the respondent and who was a member of the Constitutional Convention from Pennsylvania, in discussing the removal section of the Constitution, said (U. S. Annals of Congress, vol. 8, p. 2286, 5th Cong.):

I add that I conceive that proceedings by impeachment are restricted not only to civil officers, but that the only causes cognizable in this mode of proceeding are malconduct in office.

And again, on page 2288, he said:

My argument is that what in England is said to be the most proper and has been the most usual in this particular is, by the Constitution of the United States, the exclusive grant of proceeding by impeachment. At least that none but civil officers of the United States are liable to be thus proceeded against. I do not say that the power is limited to malconduct in office.

I also insert here one paragraph from the plea drawn by Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Dallas—that although true it is that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to; yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator and is not nor was at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to an officer of the United States; nor is he, the said William, in any of said articles charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor in the execution of any civil office held under the United States or with any malconduct in civil office or abuse of any public trust in the execution thereof. (U. S. Annots., 8th v., p. 2247.)

These quotations show that Mr. Ingersoll believed that malconduct in office was impeachable without reference to the indictability of the act.

Mr. Harper, who later defended Judge Chase, was one of the managers. In closing the argument in the Blount case, he said (p. 2316):

It seems to me, on the contrary, that the power of impeachment has two objects: First, to remove persons whose misconduct may have rendered them unworthy of retaining their offices, and, secondly, to punish those offenses of a mere political nature which, though not susceptible of that exact definition whereby they might be brought within the sphere of ordinary tribunals, are yet very dangerous to the public. These offenses, in the English law and in our constitutions, which have borrowed its phraseology, are called "high crimes and misdemeanors."

As bearing upon the meaning of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," it might be interesting to note that in the Senate on the 8th of July, 1797, as a result of the proceedings previously held to expel Blount for the offenses for which he was subsequently impeached by the House, it was resolved:

That William Blount, Esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States. (Wharton's State Trials, p. 202.)

This quotation from the proceedings in the Senate shows the sense in which the term "high misdemeanor" was used by the Senate in its resolution of expulsion and is a precedent clearly in point on the proposition that the word "misdemeanor" as used in parliamentary proceedings does not necessarily refer to indictable offenses.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PICKERING.

The next impeachment proceeding is that of Judge Pickering, Federal judge in 1803.

He was impeached for refusing to allow an appeal in a certain matter and for drunkenness. He did not appear in person, but his son asked leave to file an answer in which he claimed that his father was insane, and certain affidavits were presented to substantiate this claim. He was found guilty on all the counts and removed from office. It certainly can not be claimed that drunkenness was an indictable offense, and yet, much to my surprise, I find in the brief of counsel in the case at bar that they attempt to make that claim. I submit that matter, however, to the judgment of the Senate. It is the first time I have ever heard that comment made on the Pickering case, with the possible exception of Mr. Harper in the Chase case, who qualifies it very materially. If it should be contended that Pickering was in-peached on account of his insanity, it certainly would not be contended that insanity was an indictable offense. If it is held that this case was decided on the proof that Pickering was insane, then the case is an authority for the position that the proof of motive is not essential to a conviction under an impeachment charge.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The next case is that of Samuel Chase, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, 1805.

The articles charged injustice, partiality, arbitrary power, rude and contemptuous conduct, and so forth.

None of the acts charged were indictable, and Judge Chase contended that he could not be impeached for offenses not indictable. Counsel for the judge did not go to this extent, and practically abandoned the contention, and the judge was acquitted on the merits.

Mr. Robert G. Harper, in closing the argument for Judge Chase, said (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 3, pp. 766–767):

The honorable gentleman who opened the case on the part of the prosecution cited the case of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the part of the judge as an instance of an offense not indictable and yet punishable by impeachment. But I deny his position. Habitual drunkenness in a judge and profane swearing in any person are indictable offenses. And if they were not, still they are violations of the law. I do not mean to say that there is a statute against drunkenness and profane swearing. But they are offenses against good morals, and as such are forbidden by the common law. They are offenses in the sight of God and man, definitive in their nature, capable of precise proof, and a clear defense.

In concluding a short discussion of the Pickering case, Mr. Harper said:

This case therefore proves nothing further than that habitual drunkenness is an impeachable offense.

In concluding a discussion of the Addison case, Mr. Harper said:

But I am free to declare that if Judge Addison's colleague did possess those rights, and if he did arbitrarily prevent and impede the exercise of them by an unconstitutional exertion of the powers of his office, he was guilty of an offense for which he might properly be impeached, because he must in that case have acted in express violation of the constitutions and laws.

In the foregoing statements Mr. Harper takes the position that offenses against good morals, habitual drunkenness, usurpation of power, are impeachable offenses, and in so doing clearly abandons the position that indictability is a condition precedent to impeachability.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PECK.

The fourth case was that of James H. Peck, a United States judge, in 1830.

He was impeached for "high misdemeanors in office," for imprisoning a lawyer for contempt of court.

His answer conceded the liability to impeachment on facts which would not be indictable in the following words (par. 3, p. 62, Peck's Trial):

If the court erred in adjudging and punishing it as a contempt, was it an innocent error of judgment on the part of the court or was it a high misdemeanor, because willfully and knowingly done in violation of law and with the intention imputed by the article of impeachment, to wit, wrongfully, arbitrarily, and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke E. Lawless under color of law?

This respondent presumes that it is only by making good the affirmative of the last proposition that the impeachment against him can be sustained.

Clearly admitting that indictability is not a condition precedent to impeachability.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE HUMPHREYS.

The fifth case was that of West H. Humphreys, a Federal judge, in 1862.

Humphreys was charged with making secession speeches, and in two of the seven articles was charged with treason.

Making secession speeches was not an indictable offense, and the Senate voted separately and found him guilty on each article, so that this case is an authority that indictability is not a necessary element to sustain impeachment.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

In the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson he was charged with sundry and divers acts, several of them alleging that he had violated the provisions of the law known as the "tenure of office act," and which under the terms of the act probably constituted an indictable offense.

The celebrated swing-around-the-circle article, charging him with making incendiary speeches, of course did not charge an indictable offense, but the Senate in the consideration of the various articles did not come to a vote upon this particular article, for after they had voted on three articles the Senate adjourned without day.

In this connection I wish to quote a few sentences from the argument of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens in closing the debate in the House on the resolution impeaching President Johnson (Globe, p. 1399):

Impeachment under our Constitution is very different from impeachment under the English law. The framers of our Constitution did not rely for safety upon the avenging dagger of a Brutus, but provided peaceful remedies which should prevent that necessity. England had two systems of jurisprudence—one for the trial and punishment of common offenders, and one for the trial of men in higher stations, whom it was found difficult to convict before the ordinary tribunals. The latter proceeding was by impeachment or by bills of attainder, generally practiced to punish official malefactors; but the system soon degenerated into political and personal persecution, and men were tried, condemned, and executed by this court from malignant motives. Such was the condition of the English laws when our Constitution was framed, and the convention determined to provide against the abuse of that high power so that revenge and punishment should not be inflicted upon political or personal enemies. Here the whole punishment was made to consist in removal from office, and bills of attainder were wholly prohibited. We are to treat this question, then, as wholly political, in which if an officer of the Government abuse his trust or attempt to pervert it to improper purposes, whatever might be his motives, he becomes subject to the impeachment and removal from office. The offense being indictable does not prevent impeachment, but is not necessary to sustain it.

I will also quote from the opinion of the Hon. George F. Edmunds in the trial of Andrew Johnson, Supplement Congressional Globe, page 428:

In my opinion this high tribunal is the sole and exclusive judge of its own jurisdiction in such cases, and that, as the Constitution did not establish this procedure for the punishment of crime, but for the secure and faithful administration of the law, it was not intended to cramp it by any specific definition of high crimes and misdemeanors, but to leave each case to be defined by law, or, when not defined, to be decided upon its own circumstances in the patriotic and judicial good sense of the Representatives of the States. Like the jurisdiction of chancery in cases of fraud, it ought not to be limited in advance, but kept open as a great bulwark for the preservation of purity and fidelity in the administration of affairs, when undermined by the cunning and corrupt practices of low offenders or assailed by bold and high-handed usurpation or defiance, a shield for the honest and law-abiding official, a sword to those who pervert or abuse their powers, teaching the maxim which rulers endowed with the spirit of a Trojan can listen to without emotion, that "kings may be cashiered for misconduct."

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF WM. W. BELKNAP, SECRETARY OF WAR.

This case has no bearing on the propositon of law under discussion, but is clearly an authority that the Senate will hold jurisdiction to try an ex-civil officer who is a private citizen for acts done in office. The fact that jurisdiction is determined by a majority, and conviction requires two-thirds is important only in so far as the jurisdictional question might affect the final vote on the merits. Applying the precedent established by the Belknap case to the case at bar, if the Senate has jurisdiction to try a private citizen for acts done when in office, it certainly has jurisdiction to try a circuit judge for acts done as district judge where there has been continuity of service of the same character.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE SWAYNE.

In this case an elaborate brief was filed which, though signed by counsel for the respondent, was most carefully and politely disowned by them. (Hinds III, p. 454.) It was contended in the brief that indictability was a condition precedent to impeachability—a position which was not urged by counsel for the respondent at the trial. I am glad to be able to quote from the brief of counsel in the pending trial to substantiate the claim that in the Swayne case the proposition that indictability was a condition precedent to impeachability was entirely abandoned. (Respondent's brief, p. 39.)

On reading the proceedings in that trial (Swayne) we are unable to find that counsel for Swayne discussed at all the question whether it was necessary for the conviction of their client that it should be charged and proven that he had committed an indictable offense.

Mr. President, we have shown that the doctrine that indictability is a condition precedent to impeachability finds no constitutional warrant to sustain it, is antagonistic to any proper conception of the object and purpose of impeachment, and is absolutely repudiated by an unbroken line of precedents, both State and Federal. We therefore conclude that the power to impeach is properly invoked to remove a Federal judge whenever, by reason of misbehavior, misconduct, malconduct, or maladministration, the judge has demonstrated his unfitness to continue in office, and with confidence in the correctness of our judgment we await the decision of the Senate.

ARGUMENT OF MR. NORRIS, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate with any further discussion of the facts as they have been developed in this case. My colleagues who have already addressed the Senate have analyzed and considered the evidence in all of its various phases. I desire, however, to briefly state my views on some of the legal questions of the case that have arisen in this trial.

In some of the articles of impeachment the respondent is charged with misbehavior in office, and it is claimed, as far as these articles are concerned, that he is not guilty of any offense which would properly be the subject of a prosecution by indictment or information in a criminal court. It is strenuously argued by attorneys for respondent that an impeachment lies only for offenses which are criminal in their nature and which could legally be the subject of prosecution by indictment.

WHAT OFFENSES, PARTICULARLY AS APPLIED TO JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS, ARE IMPEACHABLE UNDER THE CONSTITUTION?

The Constitution provides (Art. I, sec. 2) that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and in section 3 of the same article it is provided that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. It is undisputed, and indeed has never been questioned, that to remove a United States judge from office two things are essential: First, he must be impeached by the House of Representatives; and, second, he must be tried and convicted by the Senate upon the articles of impeachment presented by the House. There is no other way provided by the Constitution of the United States for the removal from office of a judge. In the consideration of this subject I shall draw a distinction between a judge of the United States court and all other civil officers of the United States. I shall demonstrate from the Constitution itself that a judge of the United States court can properly be impeached, convicted, and removed from office for any act from treason down to conduct that tends to bring the judiciary into disgrace, disrespect, or disrepute.

Section 4 of Article II of the Constitution reads as follows:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It will be noted that this provision of the Constitution applies to all civil officers of the United States alike. It is undisputed that it includes judges, and were there no other provision of the Constitution applying particularly to the conduct or the tenure of office of judges then there would be no distinction between the impeachment and trial of judges and any other civil officer, including the President and Vice President. But section 1, Article III, so far as the same is applicable to this case, provides:

> The judges, both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

This provision of the Constitution, it will be obverved, applies only and exclusively to judges. It has no relation to any other civil officer of the Government, and if we are not to nullify it entirely we will find that it bears a very important part in the consideration of the particular branch of the case under discussion. I desire the Senate to continually bear in mind and to faithfully observe at all times during the consideration of this subject, that in the construction of any legal document or instrument the court will so construe it as to give life and vitality to every part of the instrument, if it can reasonably and logically do so. It is our duty to construe these two provisions of the Constitution together, and, if possible, to give equal vitality and life to them both.

Most of the civil officers provided for by the Constitution have a definite fixed term, but the judges hold office during good behavior. Much of the contention arises over what is meant in section 4, Article II, by the word "misdemeanor." It is contended by the respondent that this word is intended only to apply to such offenses as are indictable and punishable under the criminal law, and that a judge can not be impeached and removed from office unless his offense, whatever it may be called, is at least of so high a degree as to make it criminal and indictable. This construction, if adhered to, absolutely nullifies that provision of section 1, Article III, above quoted, which provides that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. If judges can hold their offices only during good behavior, then it necessarily and logically follows that they can not hold their offices when they have been convicted of any behavior that is not good. If good behavior is an essential to holding the office, then misbehavior is a sufficient reason for removal from office. And if, therefore, we give full life and vitality to both of these provisions of the Constitution, we must hold that the lack of good behavior, or misbehavior, mentioned in section 1, Article III, is synonymous with the word "misdemeanor" in section 4, Article II, in all cases where the offense is less in magnitude than an indictable one.

This view of these provisions of the Constitution has been sustained by practically all of the leading law writers upon the subject. It has also been sustained by the Senate in the trial of prior impeachment cases that have taken place. John Randolph Tucker, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (Vol. I, sec. 200), after discussing the question at some length and enumerating many offenses that are impeachable, uses this language:

> But if he decides unconscientiously—if he decides contrary to his honest convictions from corrupt partiality—this can not be good behavior and he is impeachable. Again, if the judge is drunken on the bench, this is ill behavior, for which he is impeachable, and all of these are generally criminal or misdemeanors, for misdemeanor is a synonym of misbehavior. * * * To confine the impeachable offenses to those which are made crimes or misdemeanors by statute or other specific law would too much constrict the jurisdiction to meet the objects proper of the Constitution, which was, by impeachment, to deprive of office those who by act of omission or commission showed great and flagrant disqualification to hold it.

George Ticknor Curtis, in his work on the Constitutional History of the United States (p. 481), in discussing impeachment, uses this language:

> The object of the proceedings is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that, either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions, he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed.

Watson, in his work on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1634), takes the same position and says that the word "misdemeanor" is the same as "misdeed, misconduct, misbehavior, voluntary transgression." Practically the same position is taken by Foster in his work on the Constitution, in section 93. This position is sustained by a full review of the question in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, but these cases have already been called to the attention of the Senate. These citations showed that the Senate has in the past found officials guilty where the crime charged was not an indictable offense.

In Black on Constitutional Law, second edition, pages 121 and 122, it is said:

> Treason and bribery are well-defined crimes. But the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors" is so very indefinite that practically it is not susceptible of exact definition or limitation, but the power of impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or the law which, in the judgment of the House, is deserving of punishment by this means or is of such a character as to render the party accused unfit to hold and exercise his office. It is of course primarily directed against official misconduct. Any gross malversation in office, whether or not it is a punishable offense at law, may be made the ground of an impeachment.

Further on the same writer says:

> It will be observed that the power to determine what crimes are impeachable rests very much with Congress; for the House, before preferring articles of impeachment, will decide whether the acts or conduct complained of constitute a "high crime or misdemeanor," and the Senate in trying the case will also have to consider the same question.

EVEN IF WE ADMIT "MISDEMEANORS" AS USED IN SECTION 4, ARTICLE II, APPLIES ONLY TO INDICTABLE OFFENSES, YET A JUDGE CAN BE IMPEACHED FOR MISBEHAVIORS OF A LESS GRADE THAN INDICTABLE OFFENSES UNDER SECTION 1, ARTICLE III.

But suppose, for the sake of argument, it be admitted that "misdemeanors" as used in section 4, Article II, was intended by the framers of the Constitution to exclude all offenses that were not indictable under the law, it would still not necessarily follow that judges could not be impeached and removed from office for misdemeanors of so low a grade that they were not indictable. This section simply provides that all the civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. If in any other provision of the Constitution additional reasons for impeachment are given of some of these specified officers, or additional reasons are given why some of them should cease to hold office, then under such provision such specified officers could be tried, impeached, and removed even though the offense of which they might be guilty was not included in any of those enumerated in section 4, Article II.

While I believe the construction placed on "misdemeanors" by the respondent is wrong, yet they have not made a defense to the various charges of misbehavior in office, even if we accept their construction of the law that misdemeanors in this section means only indictable offenses. If, for instance, the President was expressly excluded from the officers named in this section, then I concede there would be no way under the Constitution for him to be impeached, tried, and removed from office, because there is no other provision of the Constitution that provides for any offense on the part of the President or limits his tenure of office excepting the expiration of his regular term. But if judges were expressly eliminated from this section and it read "all civil officers of the United States except judges, and so forth," it would not follow that they could not be impeached, convicted of misbehavior, and removed from office, because section 1, Article III, expressly provides that they shall only hold their offices during good behavior. In other words, our forefathers in framing the Constitution have wisely seen fit to provide for a requisite of holding office on the part of a judge that does not apply to other civil officers. The reason for this is apparent. The President, Vice President, and other civil officers, except judges, hold their positions for a definite fixed term, and any misbehavior in office on the part of any of them can be rectified by the people or the appointing power when the term of office expires. But the judge has no such tenure of office. He is placed beyond the power of the people or the appointing power, and is therefore subject only to removal for misbehavior. Since he can not be removed unless he be impeached by the House of Representatives, tried and convicted by the Senate, it must necessarily follow that misbehavior in office is an impeachable offense.

Any authority that has been cited by the respondent which shows or tends to show that a President, Vice President, or other civil officer other than a judge can not be impeached except the offense is at least of the grade of a misdemeanor that is indictable does not apply to the impeachment or trial of a United States judge. To hold that an officer whose tenure of office is definite and fixed and who will necessarily go out of office within the course of a year or two should not be impeached and removed from office for a misbehavior that does not reach in magnitude an indictable offense is entirely different from holding that an officer whose term of office ordinarily lasts for life should not be so impeached and removed. And our forefathers evidently had this distinction in mind when they applied exclusively to judges that provision of the Constitution which provides that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior.

If I am not right in my construction of the Constitution, then the Congress and the country are absolutely helpless in any attempt to get relief from a judge who drags the judicial ermine down into disgrace, but is careful in doing so not to commit any criminal offense. If I am not right in my construction, then that provision of the Constitution which says that judges shall hold office during good behavior is absolutely nullified, and as far as the good behavior part of it is concerned it has no vitality, no life, no effect. The judge who secretly arranges with attorneys on one side of a case to make a private argument, who not only makes such arrangement but who initiates it, is guilty of a misbehavior. Every lawyer knows this; every Senator will admit it. Are we helpless in the premises simply because such an act is not indictable under the law? The judge who is continually asking favors of litigants in his court, if he is careful, can not be convicted of any crime; but he is guilty of a misbehavior. No one will dispute it. He is perverting the ends of justice. He is bringing the judiciary into disgrace and into disrepute. Carried to its logical conclusion, such conduct would soon mean that our judicial system would fail. It could not survive. Are we helpless? Must we say that although the Constitution says the judge shall only hold his office during good behavior, that the House of Representatives and the Senate are unable to apply those provisions of the Constitution which provide for impeachment, trial, and removal? If our forefathers meant anything when they provided in the Constitution that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior, they certainly intended that when the judge misbehaved he should be removed from office. Such a construction of the Constitution will not violate any principle of law, but, on the other hand, it will give full effect to a constitutional provision that would otherwise be meaningless and a dead letter. Our forefathers wisely, I think, refrained in the Constitution from giving any definition to "crimes and misdemeanors" and likewise refrained from defining what would be an abuse or a violation of "good behavior." Misbehavior, the opposite of good behavior, and I think the proper appellation of any conduct that is not good behavior, implies innumerable offenses of greater or less magnitude.

As to what is misbehavior in office must be determined in the first place by the House of Representatives when they adopt the articles of impeachment. It must be redetermined by the Senate when, after listening to the evidence, they pass judgment upon the case. I think all will agree that any conduct on the part of a judge which brings the office he holds into disgrace or disrepute, or which results or has a tendency to result in the denial of absolute justice to all persons engaged in litigation in his court, is a misbehavior. Certainly such conduct is not good behavior, and the Constitution provides that he shall only hold office during good behavior. Therefore it follows that in the absence of good behavior on the part of the judge he should be removed from office. It is undoubtedly true that the House of Representatives, in passing upon articles of impeachment and the Senate upon the trial of the offense charged in such articles, where only misbehavior in office was shown, would take into consideration in reaching their conclusions not only the magnitude of such misbehaviors but the frequency of their occurrence. Where the evidence shows that a judge is continually misbehaving by engaging in conduct and practices that bring his office into disrespect and disrepute, the House and the Senate can not avoid their duty or their responsibility by saying that each distinct offense is in itself of small magnitude and not indictable.

An eminent writer on the Constitution has summed up the question in the following forcible and appropriate language:

> A civil officer may so behave in public as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon his country, and he may continue to do this until his name would become a national stench, and yet he would not be subject to indictment by any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges which says, "Judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior"? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says "A judge shall hold his office during good behavior," it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good. Suppose he should refuse to sit upon the bench and discharge the duties which the Constitution and the law enjoin upon him, or should become a notoriously corrupt character and live a notoriously corrupt and debauched life? He could not be indicted for such conduct, and he could not be removed except by impeachment. Would it be claimed that impeachment would not be the proper remedy in such a case? (Watson on the Constitution, vol. 2, pp. 1036, 1037.)

CAN A CIRCUIT JUDGE BE IMPEACHED FOR MISBEHAVIOR OCCURRING WHILE HE HELD THE OFFICE OF DISTRICT JUDGE?

In this case some of the articles of impeachment charge the respondent with offenses committed while he held the office of district judge. It will be remembered that the evidence discloses that while the respondent was holding the office of district judge he was appointed circuit judge. He passed directly from one office into the other and no interim lapsed between the time that he held the office of district judge and the time when he became circuit judge, which office he still holds. And the technical defense is made by the respondent that he can not be impeached for any misconduct or misbehavior that occurred while he was holding the office of district judge. The change was in the nature of a promotion, but the nature of his office is practically the same. The Senate will take judicial notice of the fact that at the time the respondent was district judge he had authority and jurisdiction, under the law, to sit as a circuit judge and to hold circuit court. It is a well-known fact that the district judges prior to the adoption of our code practically did all of the work in the circuit courts. Indeed, in this case in most of the particular offenses charged the respondent, although a district judge, was engaged in the function of holding circuit court. The Peale case and the Rissinger case were cases pending not in the district court, but in the circuit court, and the respondent in each case was the presiding judge. I think that the authorities are pratically unanimous that a public official can be impeached for official misconduct occurring while he held a prior office if the duties of that office and the one he holds at the time of the impeachment are practically the same or are of the same nature. The Senate must bear in mind, as stated by all of the authorities, that the principal object of impeachment proceedings is to get rid of an unworthy public official. In the State of New York it was held in the Barnard case that the respondent could be impeached and removed from office during his second term for acts committed during his first term. And in the State of Wisconsin the court held the same way in the impeachment of Judge Hubbell. To the same effect was the decision in Nebraska upon the impeachment trial of Gov. Butler. On this point the respondent relies upon the case of the State v. Hill (37 Nebr., p. 80).

In that case the State treasurer of Nebraska was impeached after he had completed his term and retired to private life. The articles of impeachment were not passed on by the legislature, in fact were not even introduced in the legislature until after the respondent had served his full term, and the court there held that impeachment did not lie; but it expressly approved the judgment of the New York court in the Judge Barnard case, the judgment of the Wisconsin court in the Judge Hubbell case, and the prior judgment of the Nebraska court in the Butler case. And the court, in giving its reason, expressly stated that the object of impeachment as defined by the constitution of that State was to remove a corrupt or unworthy officer, and that inasmuch as his term had expired prior to his impeachment he was no longer in office and the object of the constitution had been attained, and therefore impeachment would not lie. In the case at bar the functions of the office held by the respondent as district judge were practically the same as his official functions when he was made circuit judge. They were of the same nature and would be directly affected by the same misconduct in office. He has held a Federal judgeship continuously during all the time of the commission of all of the alleged offenses.

CONCLUSION.

The House in presenting the articles of impeachment were performing an official duty. The managers on the part of the House have undertaken to carry out the mandate of that body without any malice, without any ill will, but without fear or favor. Like the balance of our fellow citizens, we hold the judiciary in the highest respect. We are anxious that the citizenship generally should have for it unbounded respect and unlimited admiration. We realize that it is only by the confidence that the people have in public officials that the stability of our institutions can be maintained. When public officials disregard their duty and violate the common standards of propriety with impunity, the standard of our citizenship is lowered and the very foundation of our Government is threatened. Of all the departments of government the judiciary is and ought to be held in the highest regard. Our Government can not perform its full destiny unless the courts are above reproach and the judges above suspicion.

It is not for the managers to say what the verdict of the Senate shall be. We have done our best to give you a fair, honest, and impartial presentation of the evidence and the law as we see it and understand it. To the best of our ability we have performed our duty. Our responsibility is about ended, and your greatest responsibility is just before you. That you will perform it without fear, without favor, without prejudice, and render such judgment as you believe to be righteous is our earnest belief and our sincere conviction.

ARGUMENT OF MR. DAVIS, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager DAVIS. Mr. President, the issues presented by the case before the Senate, whether of law or fact, would seem to be neither numerous nor complex. After the exhaustive and able discussion which has been had by gentlemen who have already spoken, only the vain could hope to add anything of clarity or adornment to their presentation. I address myself, therefore, to the single purpose of showing into how narrow a compass the issues may be compressed, and shall make my remarks more in the nature of an index than a commentary.

To simplify the argument, let us admit that none of the acts with which the respondent is charged are denounced by any express legislative enactment nor are they punishable as crimes either by statute or at common law; we may go further and, for the sake of argument, concede that none of them, if done by a private individual, would in themselves evince any degree of moral turpitude. Indeed, it is even possible, although difficult, to conceive that in a moment of thoughtlessness, without due reflection upon the restraints of his position or the necessary implication arising from his course, a judge upon the bench might commit certain of the indiscretions here alleged without an intentional surrender of his judicial purity or a deliberate willingness to profit by his exalted station. But when such things are done by an occupant of the bench, and being done are repeated and persisted in, then in the opinion of the body by which these charges are preferred condonation is impossible. A course so continued amounts to gross misbehavior and demonstrates the unfitness of the man guilty of such delinquencies, and by such misconduct he forfeits, as we claim, the condition of his official tenure, which is good behavior. The case, when all is said, comes to this: Does the proof show the respondent unfit to continue in the office which he holds, and, if so, has this court power, by process of impeachment, to remove him?

Quite naturally the latter question comes on first to be examined. When the jurisdiction of the court is challenged or the sufficiency of an indictment is called in question it is useless to investigate the facts until these matters are disposed of. The issue at once narrows itself down to the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" occurring in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution; and the respondent now renews the oft-repeated contention that this language can be used only with reference to offenses which, either by common law or by some express statute, are indictable as crimes. This same proposition has been so often refuted in the past and has been so conclusively disposed of in the course of this argument that it is difficult to add more. Every canon of construction which can be applied to this clause of the Constitution negatives the position which counsel for the respondent assume. Test it by the context, by contemporary interpretation, by precedent, by the weight of authority, and by that reason which is the life of every law and the answer is always the same.

In the first place, when we read this clause of the Constitution, as we are required to do, in the light of the context of the instrument we are confronted at once by the clause fixing the tenure of judges of the Federal courts during good behavior; and if it be difficult, as counsel for respondent assert, to enlarge the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" so as to embrace acts not indictable as crimes, it is certainly far more difficult to restrict "good behavior" to the narrow limits fixed by the criminal law. To say that a judge need take as the guide of his conduct only the statutes and the common law with reference to crimes, and that so long as he remains within their narrow confines he is safe in his position, is to overlook the larger part of the duties of his office and of the restraints and obligations which it imposes upon him. We insist that the prohibitions contained in the criminal law by no means exhaust the judicial decalogue. Usurpation of power, the entering and enforcement of orders beyond his jurisdiction, disregard or disobedience of the rulings of superior tribunals, unblushing and notorious partiality and favoritism, indolence and neglect—all are violations of his official oath, yet none may be indictable. Personal vices, such as intemperance, may incapacitate him without exposing him to criminal punishment. And it is easily possible to go further and imagine such indecencies in dress, in personal habits, in manner and bearing on the bench, such incivility, rudeness, and insolence toward counsel, litigants, or witnesses, such willingness to use his office to serve his personal ends, as to be within reach of no branch of the criminal law, yet calculated with absolute certainty to bring the court into public obloquy and contempt and to seriously affect the administration of justice. Can it be possible that one who has so demonstrated his utter unfitness has not also furnished ample warrant for his impeachment and removal in the public interest?

Stated in its simplest terms, the proposition of counsel is to change the language of the Constitution so that instead of reading that—the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior—

It will read that—the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices so long as they are guilty of no indictable crime.

If the latter were the true meaning, is it conceivable that the careful and exact stylists by whom the Constitution was composed would have used an ambiguous term to express it?

But counsel ask, What shall be done with that clause which provides that in case of impeachment—the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law?

This they insist is a definition by implication, and signifies that the scope of impeachment and indictment is one and the same, although the mode of trial and the penalty to be inflicted may differ. We submit, on the contrary, that this clause instead of being a declaration that impeachment and indictment occupy the same field is a recognition of the fact that the field which they occupy may or may not be identical, and recognizing this fact it merely declares that when the field of impeachment and the field of indictment overlap there shall be no conflict between them, but that the same offense may be proceeded against in either forum or in both.

The light drawn from contemporary speeches and writings confirms the position for which we contend. It is true, as counsel will point out, that in the Constitutional Convention when the word "maladministration" was proposed it was objected to by Mr. Madison as too vague, and the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" were inserted instead; but it is also true that on the 16th day of June, 1779, when debating in the House of Representatives the propriety of giving to the President the right to remove an officer, he said:

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration, for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust.

His great co-laborer, Alexander Hamilton, discussing in the sixty-fourth number of the Federalist the Senate as a Court of Impeachment, says:

A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained in a government wholly elective. The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated "political," as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself. * * * What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? Is it not designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men? If this be the design of it, who can so properly be the inquisitors for the Nation as the representatives of the Nation themselves? * * * As well the latter (State constitutions) as the former (the British constitution) seem to have regarded the practice of impeachments as a bridle in the hands of the legislative body upon the executive servants of the Government. Is not this the true light in which it ought to be regarded? * * * The necessity of a numerous court for the trial of impeachments is equally dictated by the nature of the proceeding. This can never be tied down by such strict rules, either in the delineation of the offense by the prosecutors or in the construction of it by the judges as in common cases serve to limit the discretion of courts in favor of personal security.

And, again, in the seventy-eighth number of the Federalist, when making an examination of the judiciary department, we read from his pen that—

According to the plan of the convention all judges who may be appointed by the United States are to hold their offices during good behavior, which is conformable to the more approved of the State constitutions and among the rest to those of this State. Its propriety having been drawn into question by the adversaries of that plan is no light symptom of the rage for objections which disorders their imaginations and judgments. The standard of good behavior for the continuance in office of the judicial magistracy is certainly one of the most valuable of the modern improvements in the practice of governments. In a monarchy it is an excellent barrier to the despotism of princes; in a republic it is a no less excellent barrier to the encroachments and oppressions of the representative body. And it is the best expedient which can be devised in any government to secure a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws.

And continuing the same examination in the following paper, the seventy-ninth, he goes on:

The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachments. They are liable to be impeached for misconduct by the House of Representatives, and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified for holding any further. This is the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character, and is the only one which we find in our own Constitution in respect to our own judges.

And then evidently treating the word "malconduct" as covering the whole category of voluntary actions on the part of the judge which would go to his judicial character or fitness, he discusses the want of a provision for removing the judges on account of physical or mental inability as being the only emergency unprovided for. He has in mind chiefly the inability arising from advanced age, and calls attention to the difficulty of measuring the faculties of the mind and the opportunity which the attempt would give for the play of personal and party attachments and enmities.

except in the case of insanity must for the most part be arbitrary; and insanity without any formal or express provision may be safely pronounced to be a virtual disqualification.

It can be safely said that nothing was further from the minds of the men who framed the Constitution than the construction here contended for by respondent's counsel.

Again we may look to the precedents, only to find that the word "misdemeanor" has always been treated as having a meaning of its own in parliamentary law, and that one impeachment proceeding after another has been based upon offenses not within the law of crimes. I do not repeat the many authorities for this statement which my colleagues have cited. This body, of course, being a law unto itself, is bound by no precedents save those of its own making, and even as to them no doubt has the power which any other court enjoys to overrule a previous decision, if convinced of its error. Of the cases which have been tried in this Chamber, those of Blount, Pickering, Chase, Peck, Humphreys, and Swayne have been pointed out as involving in whole or in part charges not criminal in their character. So, also, have many other cases tried in similar forums under similar constitutional provisions. Persuasive precedents are also to be found in the records of those cases investigated by the House of Representatives where articles of impeachment were authorized by a vote of the House, but for one cause or another were never tried. Such, for instance, was the case of Judge Lawrence, of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. During the year 1839 he was charged with the unauthorized removal of the clerk of his court and various improper orders made in the effort to get possession of the seal and records in the clerk's custody, with refusal to obey mandates of the Supreme Court, and with intemperance. The committee which investigated these charges recommended his impeachment for "misdemeanors in office." It is perhaps significant that the word "crimes" was intentionally omitted. The report came in as the Twenty-fifth Congress neared its close and no action was had. Doubtless the reason why the matter was never pressed is to be found in the fact that on the 3d day of September, 1841, Theodore H. McCaleb was appointed judge in his room and stead.

Again, in the year 1872, in the Forty-second Congress, the House of Representatives impeached at the bar of the Senate for "high crimes and misdemeanors" Mark H. Delahay, United States district judge for Kansas. Benjamin F. Butler headed the committee in charge and stated that—

The most grievous charge and that which is beyond all question was that his personal habits unfitted him for the judicial office; that he was intoxicated off the bench as well as on the bench.

Although there was a question as to certain alleged corrupt transactions, Mr. Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, said that it was not proven to the satisfaction of several members of the committee that there was any malfeasance in this regard; but Mr. Butler said:

The committee agree that there is enough in his personal habits to found a charge upon.

Here again the resolution was reported just as Congress was about to expire, and before any further proceedings could be had the successor of Judge Delahay was appointed.

So also in the case of Judge Durell, of the United States District Court for Louisiana, in the same Congress, against whom a resolution of impeachment was reported on the ground of his usurpation of power in issuing the so-called "midnight order" putting the United States marshal in charge of the building in the city of New Orleans in which the State legislature was about to assemble. There was no pretense, of course, that this act on his part would have warranted an indictment. The matter was summed up by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler in these words:

It seemed to me so gross an exercise of power that if the judge did not know he was exceeding his powers he ought to have known it; and in either case if he did know of course he was wrong, and if he did not know he ought to have known, and therefore he did not conduct himself well in office.

Pending the proceedings Judge Durell resigned, and for this reason only the matter was discontinued.

But without stopping to multiply precedents further, we next call attention to the long list of eminent authorities and commentators on the Constitution who uphold the construction for which we contend—Story, Curtis, Cooley, Tucker, Watson, Foster, all these and many more have been cited in the course of this discussion. Speaking as a lawyer, it must be said that the weight of authority in our favor is overwhelming.

Last of all we resort to the highest of all canons for the construction of constitutions and statutes alike, viz, "the reason of the thing." It is true that the framers of the Constitution intended to create an independent judiciary, but they never contemplated a judiciary which should be totally irresponsible. Regarding public office as a public trust, they found it necessary to lodge somewhere the power to determine whether that trust had or had not been abused. In the appointment of judges they required that the judgment of the President with reference to individual fitness should be concurred in by the Senate, and quite naturally they gave to the body which had approved the appointment the power to withdraw that approval and dismiss the officer when he had shown himself faithless to his trust. In requiring first of all a majority of the House of Representatives in order to prefer articles of impeachment and then two-thirds of the Members of the Senate present to convict, they hedged the power about with all the safeguards necessary to protect the upright official and yet leave it sufficient play to preserve the public welfare. Experience has shown how more than adequate the machinery so provided has been to prevent hasty or intemperate action. Indeed, it would seem that if the fathers erred it was in making too slow and difficult the process of removing the unfaithful and unfit. I hope—indeed, I believe—that this high court will never sanction any construction of the Constitution which will render it practically impotent for the purposes of its creation.

But in the brief filed by counsel for the respondent it is suggested that if an impeachable offense need not be criminal in fact it must still be criminal in its nature. It will at once be clear that this is a definition which does not define, and that the phrase "criminal in its nature" has no more certainty to commend it than has "good behavior." Recognizing this to be true, counsel go on to say, in the attempt to define their own language, that—for the same reason, even if the misdemeanors for which impeachment will lie are not necessarily indictable offenses, yet they must be of such a character as might properly be made criminal.

We are not called on to agree with their position as so stated, but have no great cause to fear it.

We understand a crime or misdemeanor to be, in the language of Blackstone—

An act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it.

If the phrase "criminal in nature" means those things which might be made crimes by legislative prohibition, every act here charged against this respondent comes within the description. Certainly Congress could, by express criminal statute, forbid a Federal judge to accept gifts of money from members of his bar, to communicate in private either orally or by letter with counsel in reference to cases pending for decision, to request financial favors from parties litigant before him, and as to the Commerce Court might well forbid the members of that court to engage in the business of hunting bargains from railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce. And, certainly, if such things are not already misdemeanors or misconduct or misbehavior, a statute to forbid them can not come too soon.

So much for the law of the case. What of the facts?

The articles of impeachment call attention to 11 distinct acts of misconduct and misbehavior on the part of the respondent and close with the thirteenth article drawing the necessary inference from the specific acts alleged. In point of time they may be divided between the service of Judge Archbald as a district judge and his service as circuit judge and judge of the Commerce Court. Five of them occurred during his district judgeship, to wit: The appointment of Jury Commissioner Woodward, the Rissinger note and the Honduras gold-mining transaction, the John Henry Jones note and the Venezuelan land speculation, the Cannon trip and the purse from the members of his bar. Those during his circuit judgeship are: The Katydid deal, the Marian Coal Co. settlement, the deal for the dump known as Packer No. 3, the transaction with Frederick Warnke, the James R. Dainty-Everhart matter, and the correspondence with Helm Bruce.

For want of time I pass by those things which occurred during his district judgeship and classify again the six occurrences charged against him as circuit judge. Five of these have to do with transactions between himself and officers of railroads or their subsidiaries, and one with the correspondence between himself and counsel for a railroad company with reference to a pending cause. I shall not undertake to repeat what has been said as to the details of these transactions nor do I conceive it to be necessary to this case to decide the minor issues of fact which are raised as to each of them, such, for instance, as the actual value of the "Katydid culm dump," which consumed so much of the time of this trial. The undisputed or admitted facts are all sufficient, and when we come to look to these five transactions with these five different railroad companies, they present certain points of similarity too striking to escape comment. These points of curious resemblance touch the very core of this whole case.

Take the Katydid, Marian, Packer No. 3, Warnke, and the Dainty-Everhart transactions and observe, first, that Robert W. Archbald was commissioned circuit judge of the United States and assigned to the Commerce Court on the 31st day of January, 1911, and that each one of these five transactions originated within a year then following and, so far as the evidence shows, were the first of their kind in which Judge Archbald had ever been engaged.

Observe, second, that not a single one of them, whether engaged in ostensibly for his profit or not, involved the expenditure on his part of a single dollar or the investment of a single penny. His sole contribution in each instance was his approach to the officers of the various companies or the hearing he obtained from them for others.

Observe, third, that in each instance the proposition did not originate with himself, but that he was approached by some third person who requested him to take up the matter with the railroad company; thus Edward J. Williams goes to him about the Katydid culm dump and induces him to approach Capt. May, Brownell, and Richardson, officers of the Erie Railroad Co. or its subsidiary, the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.; George M. Watson or some other person interests him in the settlement of the Marian Coal Co. and the sale of its assets to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and thereupon Judge Archbald pursues beyond the point of importunity Loomis and Phillips and through them Rine and Truesdale. John Henry Jones, himself a man without financial responsibility, fixes his desires on the dump known as Packer No. 3, and at his suggestion Judge Archbald assumes the duty, again performed with vigor, of obtaining a lease on it from the Girard estate and inducing the consent thereto of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., a subsidiary of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. His only connection with the proposition, in the language of the testimony, being for the purpose of obtaining a lease from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., of seeing the Girard estate and Mr. Warriner. Frederick Warnke, having failed in person and by counsel to bend George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and the Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co., and W. J. Richards, general manager of the latter company, to his will, induces Judge Archbald to approach Richards in his behalf, and afterwards pays to Judge Archbald $500 upon his purchase of certain property the title to which seemed open to attack on the part of the Pennsylvania Coal Co., a subsidiary of the Erie Railroad Co.; and lastly Edward J. Williams once more brings James R. Dainty and Judge Archbald together, and to Judge Archbald is once more assigned the duty of procuring, if possible, from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. or S. D. Warriner, its vice president and general manager, a lease on a tract of land owned by that company and known as the Morris & Essex tract.

And, again, and in the fourth place, it will be noticed that in each one of these transactions Judge Archbald called upon these railroad companies to do something which prior to his intervention they had expressly refused or which was contrary to their fixed course of action, and which therefore required something more than normal effort. Thus we learn that May and Richardson had either refused outright or were indisposed to sell the Katydid dump until the respondent went to Richardson by way of Brownell. The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. had not only rejected the claim of the Marian Coal Co. for damages, but was stoutly contesting it in the courts when the respondent joined Watson in the effort to force a settlement. The Lehigh Valley Coal Co. had definitely refused to lease to Madeira, Hill & Co. the banks known as Packers No. 2, No. 3, and No. 4 some time before the respondent asked it to assent to his acquiring Packer No. 3; and its general manager, Mr. Warriner, states that he had never known his company to sublease any land leased from the Girard estate except in this one instance to Judge Archbald. Richards and Baer had utterly rejected Warnke's request for the Lincoln culm dump, and only after other men had tried to help him and failed did Warnke urge Judge Archbald on them as his "last shot." And, finally, when the respondent once more approached Warriner to get from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. the lease on the Morris & Essex tract for James R. Dainty he was promptly told—what undoubtedly he already knew—that it was not the policy of that company to lease or sell its coal lands.

In considering this chain of facts it must not for a moment be forgotten that Judge Archbald was a member of the Commerce Court and that the duties of that court are peculiar in that its business is restricted to a certain class of litigants, and that in that court is concentrated all the litigation of all the railroads of the United States engaged in interstate commerce having to do with the rates and facilities afforded by them to their shippers.

I do not mean to impugn the personal integrity of the officers of the railroads of this country, whether their names be mentioned in this proceeding or not, but I only state what every man knows to be true when I say that from the moment when Judge Archbald went upon the Commerce Court there was not a door closed against him in the office of any railroad in these United States, and not a reasonable request which he might make the refusal of which would not have been a source of embarrassment to the railroad officer to whom it was addressed. He knew this fact, if gifted with ordinary common sense. Beyond question Edward J. Williams knew it, John Henry Jones knew it, Frederick Warnke knew it, James R. Dainty knew it, and George M. Watson knew it. Can any man listen to this testimony without believing that there was a deliberate intent and purpose to utilize this situation?

In so far as the correspondence with Mr. Bruce is concerned, the respondent alleges that it was no more than an effort on his part to secure further light in a case about to be decided. No one will contend that a court may not utilize to the utmost the aid of counsel in solving his judicial doubts and difficulties, and that until final decision is rendered it is his right and, indeed, his duty to exhaust all the help which they can give him. The unfortunate part, however, of this correspondence is that no information of its progress or its contents was ever communicated to opposing counsel, and more remarkable still, not even communicated to his brother members of the court. So far as I know, it has been regarded from time immemorial as a gross indecency on the part of any court to solicit or accept suggestions, discussion, or argument from one party to a litigation in the absence or without the knowledge of the other. Every code of judicial ethics ever written has forbidden it, and if it did not, the common conscience of mankind would protest against it. No subtler poison can corrupt the streams of justice than that of private access to the judge.

Mr. President, all that was good in the feudal nobility was summed up in the two words of their deathless motto "noblesse oblige." They recognized that rank and station have their duties and obligations no less than their privileges. If this be true of those whose elevation springs from the mere accident of birth, how much more so of those whose title to office depends upon the esteem of their fellow citizens? How dare they for one moment forget that with them always and everywhere "noblesse oblige"? No man can justly be considered fit for public office of whatever rank or kind who does not realize the double duty resting upon him—first, to administer his trust with unflinching honesty, and, second, and hardly less important, to so conduct himself that public confidence in his honesty shall remain unshaken. This confidence of the people in the integrity of their officers is the foundation stone, the prop, the support of all free government; without it constitutions and statutes are empty forms, executives, legislators, and judges the creatures of an ephemeral day. In forms of government only that which is best administered, in fact and in appearance as well, is best. A public man, it is true, may be as chaste as ice and as pure as snow and not escape suspicion. Try as he may, he can not always avoid the ready tongue of slander; but what he can do, ought to do, and must do is to avoid putting himself in any position to which suspicion can rightfully or reasonably or naturally attach. More can not be expected of him, but nothing less should be permitted.

If it be possible to discriminate in such matters, does it not seem that these obligations rest with peculiar force upon the judge? His life is to be spent as a peacemaker in adjusting the quarrels and difficulties of his fellows and in vindicating the right of society to peace and order. The appointing power or the electorate, as the case may be, his solemn oath, the State, society itself, all stand sponsor for his absolute honesty and strict impartiality. To preserve these virtues, therefore, both in essence and in seeming, should be his first and most especial care. He must realize that he has entered upon a career monastic in its requirements, not only of labor, but of abstinence and self-denial as well. Many things which he may have been accustomed to do, many things which in other men may be permitted or approved, or, if not approved, forgiven, are cut off for him from the moment when he dons his official robe, and many avenues of life are closed to him forever. The pursuit of fortune, the chase for wealth he must put behind him; and though he need not strip himself of all his worldly goods, nor cease to give a decent degree of care and thought to the preservation of such property as he may own, he must recognize that his period of accumulation, his active participation in commercial pursuits is over for the time. He has undertaken to content himself for this loss with the honors and emoluments springing from his position and the opportunities for service that it brings. His ideal must be that expressed by John Randolph, who said, in speaking of the great chancellor of Virginia, George Wythe, that—he was in the world, yet not of the world, but was the mere incarnation of justice.

Who is there that will declare this rule too rigid or this ideal too high? If any such there be, at least even he must admit that the judge should scrupulously abstain from bargaining with litigants before him or from using the prestige of his lofty station as a means of procuring financial favors. If this were not so, think how many subtle byways of approach and influence would be opened; how quickly and surely litigants would trace the outcome of their causes to something other than a fair application of the maxims of the law; how easily a gift might be concealed under the guise of a trade opportunity; and how restless would be the suitor when compelled to submit his cause for adjudication to the favored friend or business ally of his adversary. Indeed, since judges at their best are merely human, how far might the poise and balance of their judgments be thus disturbed by a bias and a prepossession not confessed even to themselves? The mere suggestion of these things is enough. If emphasis were needed, we might content ourselves with recalling the famous but universally condemned defense of Lord Bacon, who admitted the receipt of gifts from suitors, but denied that his judgment had been adversely influenced thereby.

Measured by these standards the conduct of this respondent is indefensible indeed. There is little need to emphasize the situation by analogies; but if a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission were found to be engaged in trafficking with railroad companies for their properties; if a member of the new Court of Customs Appeals were found either in person or by his runners to be hunting bargains from importers on the New York docks, there would be none to defend him. All men will unite in regretting the necessity for action in the case at bar, but the duty of the Senate, we submit, is perfectly clear.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President——

ARGUMENT OF MR. SIMPSON OF COUNSEL FOR RESPONDENT.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, in the early days of this trial day by day one or more Senators appeared and took the oath of office for Senators who were to sit upon impeachment trials. That oath states that each Senator shall, "in all things appertaining" to this trial, "do impartial justice, according to the Constitution and laws." I take it that those words, "in all things," necessarily mean that the respondent shall be fairly advised of what the charges are against him; that the evidence shall be limited to those charges; and that the judgment which is passed upon those charges, when that time comes, shall be passed upon them, each charge by itself, according to the evidence which relates to that charge, and to that charge alone. If it does not mean that, it is a little difficult to understand what it does mean.

Upon most of those points counsel for the respondent and the managers agree. We disagree slightly as to whether the first of the things I have suggested has been thoroughly met by articles 6 and 13, but inasmuch as those two articles are in the keeping of my senior colleague, Mr. Worthington, I shall not dwell upon that point.

There is, however, in that oath one other thing that I want to dwell upon, because it is really at the root of the whole of the charges; and that is, that to this respondent "impartial justice" is to be done, "according to the Constitution and laws." What laws are there referred to? Necessarily, I take it, it must be the laws of the United States, yet I do not recall having heard during the four arguments of yesterday and to-day any particular reference to the laws of the United States.

It was suggested by several of the managers yesterday that a violation of section 132 of the Judicial Code might have been charged in some of these articles, but it was admitted in the same breath that there was no charge under that section, which relates only to bribery, and it is, of course, admitted that you can not convict this respondent on a charge of bribery when he is not charged with bribery.

It is evident that the managers felt the difficulty of their position in that regard, for when Mr. Manager STERLING made his argument yesterday, in order to avoid just that difficulty, he used this language, which I prefer to read, so that there may be no mistaking his exact meaning. I am reading from page 1345:

And so, Mr. President, I say, that outside of the language of the Constitution which I quoted there is no law which binds the Senate in this case to-day except that law which is prescribed by their own conscience, and on that, and on that alone, must depend the result of this trial. Each Senator must fix his own standard; and the result of this trial depends upon whether or not these offenses we have charged against Judge Archbald come within the law laid down by the conscience of each Senator for himself.

Sirs, if that be so, I want to know what has become of the Constitution in this case? Of what use was it to write into the Constitution that a man shall be impeached only for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," if there is no law to govern you and if you may, out of your own consciences, evolve the thought that you will dismiss this respondent from the public service simply because you wish to get rid of him. You need no proof of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" to discharge him, if that is the position you are to take in this case, for those words, under such circumstances, are unnecessary and meaningless.

I submit that that is not and can not be the true legal position. It must be precisely the reverse of that. You must find somewhere, whether it is under the "good-behavior" clause of the Constitution or whether it is under the article relating to impeachments themselves, that upon which you can lay your finger and say that this respondent has violated that thing, or you must under your oaths of office say that he shall go free.

Nay, there is more than that in this. Judge Curtis, one of the ablest lawyers this country has ever known, met just that claim in the trial of the President. In those days of excitement one wonders not that such a position was maintained. I do wonder that at this day, in the quiet of this Senate Chamber, when men are supposed to be viewing this matter in a judicial capacity, when there is no political excitement to distract them from the performance of their duty, that such a position should be taken. But when it came before the Senate in the trial of Andrew Johnson, this is what Judge Curtis said. I may be pardoned for reading it, as probably no man could better say it than he:

> But the argument does not rest mainly, I think, upon the provisions of the Constitution concerning impeachment. It is, at any rate, vastly strengthened by the direct prohibitions of the Constitution. "Congress shall pass no bill of attainder or ex post facto law." According to that prohibition of the Constitution, if every Member of this body, sitting in its legislative capacity, and every Member of the other body, sitting in its legislative capacity, should unite in passing a law to punish an act after the act was done, that law would be a mere nullity. Yet what is claimed by the honorable managers in behalf of Members of that body? As a Congress you can not create a law to punish these acts if no law existed at the time they were done; but sitting here as judges, not only after the fact but while the case is on trial, you may individually, each one of you, create a law by himself to govern the case.

That is his quotation of what was claimed in the Johnson case, just as Mr. Manager STERLING claims it here.

Then Judge Curtis goes on:

> According to this assumption the same Constitution which has made it a bill of rights of the American citizen, not only as against Congress but as against the legislature of every State in the Union, that no ex post facto law shall be passed—this same Constitution has erected you into a body and empowered everyone of you to say aut inveniam aut faciam viam—if I can not find a law I will make one. Nay, it has clothed everyone of you with imperial power; it has enabled you to say, sic volo sic jubeo stat pro ratione voluntas—I am a law unto myself, by which law I shall govern this case.

And that is the position which Mr. Manager STERLING, speaking for the managers, asks you to take here. He asks you not to look to the law of the land for that which shall govern the rights of the parties here; but he asks you, out of your own conscience, whether your conscience agrees with mine or his or anybody's, to evolve a law which shall apply to this case, and which, when this case is over, shall cease ever thereafter to be the law. And that is said to men who are here trying a case according to law. In sooth, I would rather quote as the true guide for your deliberations what Mr. Manager Buchanan, afterwards President Buchanan, said on the trial of Judge Peck, when he said:

> I freely admit that we are bound to prove that the respondent has violated some known law of the land.

That is the claim which the respondent's counsel make here as antagonistic to the lawless claim of the managers as above quoted.

Turning now to the Constitution—and I am not going to go at great length into this, because my senior colleague is the one who prepared the brief upon this particular point and who is entitled to all the honor and credit for it and will deal with it himself when his turn comes, and hence I shall only deal with it partially—but turning to it for the purpose of partially dealing with it, let us see where we land ourselves when the Constitution is taken into consideration. It needs no panegyric here. The managers might have saved themselves the trouble of praising it up to the seventh heaven. But in this, as in everything else, the Constitution is only a frame of government. It remains for the Congress to vivify many of its provisions. It remains for Congress to write on the statute books what shall constitute "high crimes and misdemeanors," and there are already in the Revised Statutes many provisions upon that point. One of them, you may remember, came up in the Andrew Johnson impeachment. Another one I will refer to in a little while.

But it is said that in this case you do not need any statute; you have the provision of the Constitution which says that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. Now, I want to know what good behavior means. This is the provision:

If you take that whole clause and consider it, either historically or grammatically, you will find that the words "good behavior" relate to good behavior in office. The compensation which is to be paid is for service in the office. The good behavior which is the tenure is to be good behavior in the office. But, say the managers, it is not good behavior in office which is the test at all, and you may impeach and remove a man even though he has behaved perfectly well in his office. Personally I agree with that. I am not challenging that position; but it answers their proposition now being considered that good behavior in office is the tenure by which the respondent holds, and for a breach of that he may be removed from office without considering the impeachment clause of the Constitution.

I do not think that the good-behavior clause has anything whatever to do with the impeachment. Everybody knows how the good-behavior clause came into being. In the ancient days the judges, like all other civil officers, held their positions at the pleasure of the king. Then the barons wrested from the king his power of dismissal, and required that there should be a good-behavior tenure rather than a tenure at the pleasure of the king, subject at that time only to the power of impeachment. And then a little later—I think it was in 1701, after the revolution—there was added the removal power; so that, upon address, judges might be removed the same as upon impeachment.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Without a trial.

Mr. SIMPSON. Without a trial. Those are the circumstances under which the good-behavior tenure came into existence.

But what does "good behavior" mean if you are going to take that alone into consideration? A man ill behaves if he speaks unduly cross to his wife and children. May he be removed from office because of that? If he is the happy owner of an automobile, he may violate the speed laws and be haled before some magistrate and fined.

Is he to be removed from office because of that? No one would answer "Yes" to either of those questions, and hence you must get down to something definite, something upon which you can lay your finger and say, "There is the definite thing which this man should have known, and as he should have known it and has chosen to violate it he must pay the penalty of his violation." That definite thing can be ascertained only by reference to the clause which says that he may be impeached for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." In the ordinary sense of the term one can understand how a man can be of perfectly good behavior in everything else and still be guilty of treason, but does anybody doubt but that he could be removed from office if he was guilty of treason? In truth, you have to go back from the good-behavior clause to the impeachment clause to find out what are the causes for an impeachment. It is the impeachment clause which is the controlling clause and not the good-behavior clause at all.

The argument that grows out of the claim that a violation of the good-behavior clause is sufficient justification for an impeachment is as clearly reasoning in a circle as anybody can well imagine. Concede that good behavior is the tenure, still you can not remove a man from office, under the Constitution, unless he is guilty of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," and hence the determinative factor as to whether or not a judge was of good behavior is whether or not he was guilty of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." And so you may go round in a circle and get nowhere except where you started.

Now, one thing must certainly be evident in this matter. It was claimed by the managers yesterday, and partially by Mr. Manager HOWLAND to-day, that the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" as used in this provision of the Constitution were taken bodily out of the English practice, the English parliamentary law, as they said. That is unquestionably true. It is not true that in all the impeachments in England they used the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," but those words are used in a number of their impeachments. This being so, you must either accept the construction placed upon those words in the lex parliamenti, or you must decline to accept that construction. If you decline to accept it, of course that branch of the argument falls by the wayside at once. But if you accept it, then the question arises, which of the English precedents are you going to accept, in view of the fact that some hold that an impeachable offense need not be an indictable one, and others hold a precisely anagonistic view. Are you going back to the days when a man was impeached simply because he happened to have been put in office by those who have themselves just been turned out? If that is the view you are going to accept, then, perhaps, every four years in this country there will be a wholesale slaughter. But if you are going to accept the best precedents which appear upon the English reports, and especially those down near to the time when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, then, as is shown in the brief, and as I have no doubt Mr. Worthington will refer you to, those best precedents show that except for an indictable offense no impeachment would lie under the laws of England.

But what are you going to do if you take the matter is to be considered solely under the language of the Constitution itself? The word "misdemeanors" in that clause must be taken either in the technical sense or in the popular sense. If that word is taken in the technical sense everybody knows that a misdemeanor taken technically is a crime pure and simple. If it is taken in the popular sense, then, notwithstanding what some text writers have said, I venture the assertion that if you go out into the cars or on the streets or in your homes and ask the people you meet what is meant by the words "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" you will not find one in a thousand but will say that every one of those words imports a crime. If that is so, then necessarily, when you come to construe those words after this trial is over, you will necessarily have to reach the conclusion that these charges must be indictable or they can not be impeachable.

I have infringed somewhat probably, Mr. Worthington, on your copyright, I admit, in touching this question, but there is one other thing I want to refer to before I leave it. Mr. HOWLAND referred yesterday to the impeachment of Alexander Addison, and as he thereby trespassed upon my bailiwick I prefer to deal with that case rather than to leave Mr. Worthington to deal with it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Go ahead, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON. Alexander Addison was impeached. He was impeached shortly after Jefferson became President. I do not need to recall to this assembly what the condition of the public mind was at that time as between the then Republicans, represented by Jefferson, and the Federalists, who had gone out of power.

It is true, as Mr. HOWLAND stated, that the attorney general of the State presented to the supreme court a request for leave to submit to the grand jury an information against Alexander Addison. It is not accurate to state that the supreme court said that the charge against him was not an indictable offense. What the supreme court did say to the attorney general was this:

> Inasmuch as the affidavit which you have presented to us does not charge either willfulness or malice against Judge Addison, it is insufficient to charge an indictable offense. If you amend it by charging willfulness and malice, then there will be a misbehavior in office charged, and that is indictable.

But those in power did not choose to amend it. Having control of both branches of the legislature of my State, they preferred to proceed by way of impeachment, and they impeached Judge Addison and he appeared. Did he say that the charges against him were not indictable? On the contrary, although he tried his own case from beginning to end, he started out and stoutly maintained throughout the proceeding that the charge was an indictable charge, and the record of the case which Mr. Manager HOWLAND had shows it most clearly.

Instead, therefore, of that case being a precedent for the position that an offense may be impeachable which is not indictable, it is the precise reverse of that; for, as stated, the respondent himself boldly admitted that the offense with which he was charged was indictable, and therefore was impeachable.

Let me ask this upon conclusion on this point of the case: Suppose that among the various suggested amendments to the Constitution of the United States some one would come along, in view of the position taken in a few places at least in our country, and ask for and succeed in obtaining an amendment which would fix a term of years for each judge. Instead of holding during good behavior, they would hold then for 10 or 20 or 30 or any number of years that you choose. Does anybody pretend, can anybody pretend, that the duties of the judge would be altered in the slightest degree? Would there not be required of him the same good behavior and could he not be impeached for the same lack of good behavior or indulgence in bad behavior, or whatever you choose to call it, just the same as he can now when there is a term of office during good behavior? If that is so, and certainly no one will say that the duty of a judge would change by reason of such an amendment as that, then, as heretofore claimed in this argument, the good-behavior clause has nothing whatever to do with the question of impeachment.

I pass from the point, perhaps having dwelt longer upon it than my time justifies, and inquire what is the law which, under the oaths of office of Senators, they are bound to apply to a large number, at least, of the articles of this impeachment? I heard it said yesterday, "Why, the facts are admitted in relation to Judge Archbald." Yes; a good many of the facts are admitted; but the question whether the facts are or are not admitted plays but the slightest conceivable part in this determination of this case. Is there in the answer any admitted fact upon which criminality can be founded? Is there in that answer any admitted fact or series of facts upon which a violation of law can be stated? Not in the slightest degree.

It is said, "Why, he purchased culm dumps and prepared to engage in the business of washing the coal in the Katydid and in Packer No. 3," and so on. Yes, he did. He admits that. Is that a crime?

Away back in 1812 Congress passed the only act of which I have any knowledge which bears even in the slightest degree on the question of the duties of a judge outside of the time when he is sitting for the performance of his judicial duties. That provision is now in section 713 of the Revised Statutes, and it reads thus:

> SEC. 713. It shall not be lawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law. And any person offending against the prohibition of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.

There you have written into your statute books that engaging in the practice of law while a judge shall be a high misdemeanor, and of course that would bring the case within the impeachment clause of the Constitution I have so often quoted. But the very fact that you do not say of a judge that he shall not engage in any other business necessarily implies, under the doctrine expressio unius, est exclusio alterius, that Congress has not yet seen fit to say that a judge shall not engage in any other business so long as he is judge; and until you see fit to say that he has the right to carry on any business, provided only he carries it on as you or I or anybody else would carry it on, in a decent and honest manner.

It was suggested yesterday that out of this trial there might grow a statute upon that point. I would welcome such a satute. If there is a doubt to-day in the public mind, or in the mind of any single Senator on this floor, that judges ought to be prohibited from carrying on any business, I would welcome the passage of such a statute, so that it might be known definitely by every judge on the Federal bench what he may and what he may not do. If, after that, after you have told him what he may not do, he willfully disobeys, then rightfully may he be impeached; but until that time comes, I submit that the only thing you ought to do or that the Congress ought to do is what was done after the trial of Judge Peck, when he was acquitted of the charge made against him. Then it was that Congress, in 1831, I think it was, passed the act in relation to contempts, which remains upon the statute books until to-day. Give us something definite, something certain, in regard to this matter; otherwise you are convicting a man, as Judge Curtis said, by an ex post facto law, and you are, as by a bill of attainder, taking from him his office without ever having theretofore told him that he should not do that which you are convicting him for doing.

There is another point in this same connection upon which I want to dwell a little while before I come to the evidence in the case. I have repeatedly said that the Senate is sitting here as a court. I am not going into the much controverted question which has arisen from time to time, and which was such a bugbear during the trial of the President, as to whether it ought to be called a high court of impeachment or only a Senate.

The question, however, is whether or not the duty which you have to perform is in point of fact a judicial duty. It must be conceded that it is not a legislative duty. That is perfectly clear. It is certainly equally clear that it is not an executive duty. I can not see what else remains unless it is a judicial duty.

But the Constitution in its various articles has made that exceedingly clear. In Article I, section 3, it says "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." It says, "When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present." It says, "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office," and so on, "but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to the law." It says in Article II, section 2, "The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment," and Article III, section 2, lastly says "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crime shall have been committed."

Now, I want to ask if it is possible to use words more clearly demonstrative that that which you as Senators are doing you are doing in a judicial capacity. That is what I am claiming at this stage. It will reach up itself to its proper conclusion after a little while. The point is, you are in fact sitting as judges. I read, for it expresses briefly the thought, the language of Prof.

When a criminal act has been committed it may evidently be regarded in three aspects—first, the injury to the individual or his family may be considered; second, the wrong to the executive officer charged with the administration of the laws may be looked at; and, third, the mind may dwell upon the general wrong done to the State, or "the people," as we say in modern times. This view was early taken in the common law; the injury to the individual was redressed by a proceeding called an appeal; the injury to the King by a process called an indictment; the wrong to the entire Nation by a proceeding called an impeachment. In process of time the injury to the individual came to be regarded as a private and not as a public wrong, so that in the progress of the law there remained two great criminal proceedings—indictment and impeachment.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON, when reference was made to that quotation in a very early stage of this trial, said that many of the things which Prof. Dwight referred to had not been sustained by the adjudications of this body. That I do not care to go into. It is immaterial for the thought which I wish to present. Certain it is, however, that that historical statement, thus briefly presented, has never been controverted by anybody and can not successfully be, for it is part of the judicial history of England.

Indeed, when the managers were preparing their brief in this case they unwittingly said some of the things which I wish to quote to you now as bearing out exactly the thought that I want to present. I am reading from pages 6 and 7 of the brief, particularly in the quotations from Tucker on the Constitution. He says this:

(f) The word "maladministration," which Mr. Mason originally proposed and which he displaced because of its vagueness for the words "other high crimes and misdemeanors," was intended to embrace all official delinquency or maladministration by an officer of the Government where it was criminal; that is, where the act done was done with willful purpose to violate public duty. There can be no crime in an act where it is done through inadvertence or mistake, or from misjudgment. Where it is a willful and purposed violation of duty it is criminal.

In another place:

So, if he omits a judicial duty, as well as when he commits a violation of duty, he is guilty of crime or misdemeanor; for, says Blackstone, "crime or misdemeanor is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it."

* * * * * * *

And again:

It must be criminal misbehavior—a purposed defiance of official duty—to disqualify the man from holding office, or disable him from ever after holding office, which constitute the penalty upon conviction under the impeachment process.

I claim no more than that for the purpose of my argument in this case.

So, when they came to quote from Foster on the Constitution, unhappily they left out the vital clause in the extract which they undertook to make. It was most convenient to substitute asterisks for that vital clause, but I prefer to read the whole of the paragraph, including the vital clause and leaving out the asterisks. As it is quoted in that brief, these are the words:

The term "high crimes and misdemeanors" has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can be found only in the law of Parliament and is the technical term which has been used by the Commons at the bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States.

Then come the asterisks. These are the words which the asterisks displace:

But the judgments of the Senate of the United States in the cases of Chase and Peck, as well as those of the State senates in the different cases which have been before them, have established the rule that no officer should be impeached for any act that does not have, at least, the characteristics of a crime, and public opinion must be irremediably debauched by party spirit before it will sanction any other course.

That is the law as I understand it, and I pass therefore from it. It is a rule of law founded on legal principles, applied not only in impeachment cases, but in every other class of cases that ever comes before a court. At the very basis of all constructions, whether of constitution or of statutes or of contracts, is the maxim noscitur à sociis, which says neither more nor less than that words are to be taken in their meaning in conjunction with the other words with which they are, in fact, associated. It has found this construction so many times that it is perhaps only necessary for me to refer to one more set of cases in order to put the point clearly in the minds of the Senate.

In the various turnpike cases, when they were more flourishing in the earlier days, it was quite common to say that the turnpike company should have the right to charge toll for all carriages, wagons, carts, and other vehicles which used the turnpike, and also they might charge toll for all horses, cattle, hogs, and other animals which used the turnpike. But it was held without exception in every case that I ever heard tell of that the words "other vehicles" did not, for instance, cover baby carriages, though they were vehicles just as well as the others; and that the word "animals" did not cover man, though he is an animal just as much as a horse or a steer, and perhaps quite as much of a hog sometimes as the ones that pay toll when they travel along the turnpike.

The point is that general words, like the word "misdemeanor" in this case, are to be construed in accordance with the words which precede; and under the constitutional provision that is particularly emphasized by the use of the word "other" in the phrase "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

If the position I have taken on this point be accurate, we ought to be able to take the next step, and a long one, in regard to this matter. If this is a court, then it is perfectly evident that the rules which experience has demonstrated to be wise and applicable in trials in other courts ought to be applied here, and among those rules which are down at the very foundation of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence are those which relate to the effect of character evidence, to the effect of the reasonable-doubt doctrine, to the effect of the presumption of innocence, and to the effect to be given to admissions made during a trial. I prefer for a convenient purpose to treat of the question of the admissions made during the trial first. When we were introducing the character evidence in this case Mr. Manager CLAYTON rose and said this——

Mr. SIMPSON. On page 888:

I may say, Mr. President, in the beginning, that we have not controverted the good character of Judge Archbald. Perhaps if we had controverted that a larger range would be permissible for the respondent in reply to that controversy raised by the managers. But the managers have not raised that question.

Again, on page 889:

We have not charged that while actually sitting on the bench Judge Archbald was guilty of these several misbehaviors. We have charged misbehaviors when he was not sitting on the bench. The whole case is his behavior aside from the discharge of his mere official duties while actually sitting.

Again, on page 889:

Mr. President, I do not think it necessary to detain the Senate longer. I insist that inasmuch as his good character is not controverted this range of examination sought here by the counsel is not permissible.

Again—I read from page 915:

So, Mr. President, I respectfully submit to you and to the Senate that after these gentlemen have examined 10 witnesses on character and when the testimony of those character witnesses is not disputed—is not controverted—and when the managers tell the Senate it will not be controverted, it seems to me that the further examination of character witnesses might well be dispensed with.

It was in recognition of that fact—that is, the evidence relating to the character witnesses—that this body passed its order that 15 character witnesses should be the limit. A little later on in the examination, on page 891, this question was asked:

Q. Now, Maj. Warren, I want to ask you to tell us, from your long acquaintance with Judge Archbald and your observation of him as a judge, what were his principal characteristics as a judge as to integrity, ability, and industry.

Objection was made to that, and your Presiding Officer in sustaining the objection said, on page 892:

This particular question is as to the opinion of the witness himself. If the counsel would limit his question to the witness's knowledge of the general character of the respondent for judicial integrity, the Chair would think that was competent; but this question not only asks the individual opinion of the witness, leaving aside the question of general reputation, but it goes further and asks for the opinion of the witness, not only as to integrity, but as to ability and industry, none of which characteristics or features are involved, as the Chair understands, in any issue before the Senate at this time.

And the managers sat here and did not raise any point touching that ruling of the Chair, which was in fact made on their objection, so that they stand to-day estopped by their silence from denying Judge Archbald's judicial integrity, or his individual integrity, or his ability, or his industry. Those facts must stand throughout this trial as admitted facts, not relating to one article but to every article in the case.

One other reading and I shall have passed from that which I want to read in regard to this point. I am reading from page 905. When Judge Gray was upon the witness stand I asked him this question:

Q. Will you please tell us what is his reputation for integrity and impartiality as a judge, if you know?

That was objected to, and the Presiding Officer said this, on page 906:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks, however, that the question transcends the limitation. The witness is asked the question as to his impartiality. The Chair thinks it ought to be limited as to his reputation for integrity as a judge.

And again the managers sat silent.

We have therefore as admitted facts, I may say, certainly, undisputed facts in this case, that Judge Archbald is a man whose integrity is unquestioned, whose judicial integrity is unquestioned, whose industry, whose ability, whose impartiality are all unquestioned; and those elements are necessarily vital in determining the truth or falsity of the charges which are here made against him.

Let us see how far they go as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. I prefer to limit my quotations to the judgments of that tribunal, not only because it stands highest in the land, but because it is the best exponent on Federal questions.

In the case of Kirby v. The United States (174 U. S., 47), this was said:

> The presumption of the innocence of an accused attends him throughout the trial and has relation to every fact that must be established in order to prove his guilt beyond reasonable doubt. "This presumption," this court has said, "is an instrument of proof created by the law in favor of one accused, whereby his innocence is established until sufficient evidence is introduced to overcome the proof which the law has created."

In Coffin versus United States, One hundred and fifty-sixth United States Reports, I read from page 460. This is said in the opinion written by the present Chief Justice:

> Concluding, then, that the presumption of innocence is evidence in favor of the accused introduced by the law in his behalf, let us consider what is "reasonable doubt." It is of necessity the condition of mind produced by the proof resulting from the evidence in the cause. It is the result of the proof, not the proof itself; whereas the presumption of innocence is one of the instruments of proof, going to bring about the proof, from which reasonable doubt arises; thus one is a cause, the other an effect. To say that the one is the equivalent of the other is therefore to say that legal evidence can be excluded from the jury, and that such exclusion may be cured by instructing them correctly in regard to the method by which they are required to reach their conclusion upon the proof actually before them. In other words, that the exclusion of an important element of proof can be justified by correctly instructing as to the proof admitted.

Skipping a portion, I read now from page 461:

> Whether thus confining them to "the proofs," and only to the proofs, would have been error if the jury had been instructed that the presumption of innocence was a part of the legal proof, need not be considered, since it is clear that the failure to instruct them in regard to it excluded from their minds a portion of the proof created by law, and which they were bound to consider. "The proofs and the proofs only" confined them to those matters which were admitted to their consideration by the court, and among those elements of proof the court expressly refused to include the presumption of innocence, to which the accused was entitled, and the benefit whereof both the court and the jury were bound to extend him.

Again, from Edgington v. United States (164 U. S., p. 365), I read this:

> It is impossible, we think, to read the charge without perceiving that the leading thought in the mind of the learned judge was that evidence of good character could only be considered if the rest of the evidence created a doubt of defendant's guilt. He stated that such evidence "is of value in conflicting cases," and that if the mind of the jury "hesitates on any point as to the guilt of the defendant, then you have the right and should consider the testimony given as to his good character."
> Whatever may have been said in some of the earlier cases, to the effect that evidence of the good character of the defendant is not to be considered unless the other evidence leaves the mind in doubt, the decided weight of authority now is that good character, when considered in connection with the other evidence in the case, may generate a reasonable doubt. The circumstances may be such that an established reputation for good character, if it is relevant to the issue, would alone create a reasonable doubt, although without it the other evidence would be convincing.

Now, if those principles are applied to the admissions as to good character, as to industry, as to integrity, and as to impartiality, I ask what, then, is the conclusion which the Senate ought to reach in regard to considering the evidence in the case?

Perhaps before passing, however, to that evidence I ought to refer somewhat briefly, as I must, but none the less in order to disabuse the minds of the Senate of any lodgment which may have been found in it by reason of the case of the Amity Coal Co., which was called to the attention of Mr. Willard when he was upon the witness stand, and to Judge Gray likewise, so that you may know that that which was said by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania casts, in fact, no reflection upon Judge Archbald. We have in our State a statute providing for the formation of joint-stock associations. Like most of those statutes they are a delusion and a snare to anybody who tries to form an association under them. If you fail to dot an "i" or to cross a "t" you are almost certain to find yourself in a position where you will pay the penalty in any suit that happens to be brought against you individually. In this particular case the statute provided, among other things, that the certificate should state "the amount of capital stock of the said association subscribed by each subscriber, the total amount of the capital, and when and how to be paid."

Judge Archbald, before he became a judge at all, in drawing the articles of association for himself and his associates when they formed the Amity Coal Co., did not pay in anything. They construed that statute to mean, when it says "when and how to be paid," that there was not any necessity at the time to pay in anything. That view of the law was taken by the judge of the lower court when the case came before him for consideration. It went to the upper court, the supreme court of the State, and they said that that was not a proper construction of it, and this though every dollar of the capital had in fact been paid in in the interim and a great many thousands of dollars besides. But because in the inception of the thing there had not been a payment in of money, which the court thought by analogy under the corporation act ought to be at least 10 per cent of the amount of capital subscribed, therefore, there was held to be a personal liability in that case, but the court was most careful to say—I am now quoting from the opinion on page 899:

> In saying this we do not impute an intention to defraud or reflect upon the motives of the gentlemen by whom the Amity Coal Co. was organized. They may have supposed themselves to be complying with the provisions of the act. Our business is not with their motives, but with what they did; and our inquiry is whether this association was organized in accordance with the fair interpretation of the act of 1874.

And because of that construction they held it was not; and yet two of the ablest judges of that court—I mean of the Supreme Court—agreeing with the judgment of the judges of the court below, dissented from that conclusion. Now, I ask the Senate, can it be that because Judge Archbald drew the articles which, in the judgment of two of the upper judges of the Supreme Court and all of the judges of the lower court, were in exact compliance with the law, that he is to be held guilty of any moral wrong because in fact the upper court thought that it was not in compliance with the law, and that, too, in face of the fact that the upper court said that they did not mean in any way to reflect upon him? If that is so, I want to know how many of the 60 lawyer Members of this Senate would always find themselves safe from just such a reflection as that. If a man, whether a lawyer or no, is bound to be held to be immoral because he makes a mistake in the law, then the lawyers are in as sad a plight as were the lawyers in the early days of my Commonwealth, when the Quakers there refused to permit any lawyers to dwell therein.

Now, let us see what is the result of the matter so far presented. We have a man admittedly of high character; we have a man whose judicial integrity is not challenged; we have a man who, it is admitted, is impartial in all that which he has done, who is able and who is industrious, and you are asked, notwithstanding those admitted facts, to find that he has been guilty of wrongdoing.

You get down, therefore, just to this position: You are asked to say that because of suspicion this man is to be convicted of a wrong and excluded from office, though it is an admitted fact that there was nothing done which was wrong at all; in other words, the suspicion of wrong is to control the fact that there was no wrong in this case. Even in the palmiest days of impeachment, under the English practice, no case can be found in which such admissions appear upon the record of an impeachment trial.

I pass, Senators, from the law and carry myself to the facts in the case. I desire to say that my senior colleague will look after article No. 1, article No. 3, article No. 6, and article No. 13. The other charges are the ones which I am to take care of as best I may in this argument before you.

Article 2 charges that Judge Archbald, while a judge of the Commerce Court, undertook to effect a settlement between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.; that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a litigant in the court over which he was a judge; that he undertook to do that for a consideration; that, by various conversations and correspondence, he undertook to use his influence as a judge for that consideration to bring to pass a settlement; and that, by reason of those acts, he is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor.

You will observe in the answer he admits that he did try to effect the settlement. He admits that he did that because of his friendship for Mr. Watson and for Mr. C. G. Boland; but he denies everything which undertakes to import to that which he did either criminality or any breach of good manners or propriety. The issues which you are called upon, therefore, to consider is whether or not an impeachable offense is charged—as to which I have said all that I desire to say—whether or not Judge Archbald, for a consideration, undertook to effect that settlement; whether or not what is commonly spoken of here as the Lighterage case was in any real sense pending in his court at the time he undertook to effect that settlement, and, if it was, what the effect was; whether or not he corruptly used his influence as a judge and whether or not what he did constituted a high misdemeanor in office.

The first question, of course, is whether he undertook to do that for a consideration. The managers once or twice during the trial and once or twice yesterday said that they did not think that the question as to whether or not he undertook to do it for a consideration moving to himself was a material question, but by innuendo they still insist, to use the language of Mr. Manager STERLING, that they believe that he did.

I agree with them that the question as to whether or not he was to do this for a consideration moving to himself is immaterial in this sense; that is to say, if he undertook to effect that settlement for a consideration moving to his friend it would be just as much a crime and a wrong, if it was done corruptly, as it would have been if it had been done for a consideration moving to himself; but there must inhere in it corruption, otherwise there is no crime and no wrong in relation to it. That is the point as to which this evidence becomes important.

The only evidence as to whether or not he did undertake for a consideration to do anything rests in the statement of Mr. C. G. Boland. When Mr. C. G. Boland was recalled as a witness to testify as to this point, the Senate will remember that there was quite an extended argument, and, by a comparatively small vote, the objection of the respondent's counsel was overruled. The question was then put—and I will read the question and answer:

Q. Now, go ahead and state what he said about that.—A. He said that as the judge was assisting him in the matter he felt that he ought to be compensated, and that he proposed to compensate him by one-fourth of the amount he was to receive in excess of $95,000, which was the price it was to net to us.

That is found on page 720. That is to say—so that it may have the fullest effect that can be given to it—Mr. C. G. Boland said that Mr. Watson said that he, Mr. Watson, thought the judge ought to be compensated, and that he, Mr. Watson, proposed to compensate him. That, you will remember, Mr. Boland testified, was said when he and Mr. Watson were alone. He further said it was never communicated to the judge at any time or under any circumstances; and I want to ask the Senate whether or not they can find a man guilty of a charge like that upon a double hearsay statement never carried to the man who is to be charged?

But that question is only a very small part of the answer to it. Mr. Watson, whose testimony you have not heard read, denies that anything like that was said. I shall have, therefore, to detain you long enough to read a portion of that testimony. I read from pages 1141 and 1142:

Mr. WORTHINGTON. One thing, there has been some testimony here in relation to you that I have not heard you asked about, and that is about a division of the difference between one hundred thousand and a hundred and sixty thousand dollars into fours. Have you read the testimony on that subject?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. What have you to say about it, Mr. Watson?

Mr. WATSON. I never heard that until I read it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Had there been any suggestion by anybody, while the negotiations were going on, that Mr. Phillips or Mr. Loomis should participate in what was to be paid?

Mr. WATSON. Absolutely not.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Was there any suggestion at any time that Judge Archbald should receive anything in any way as compensation for what he did in this matter?

Mr. WATSON. Not to me; I never heard of it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Was there anything said about that by anybody, to your knowledge?

Mr. WATSON. No; I do not know anything about that. Only two people that I ever heard was to get any money out of this, and one was Reynolds and one was me. That is all I ever heard of.

I will not stop here to read the judge's testimony denying that same statement, because it must be very fresh in your own minds. I submit that, with the two disputing it and Mr. Boland not undertaking to assert it of his own knowledge, but only that somebody else said it, you can draw no conclusion antagonistic to the judge. But the case is infinitely stronger than that. The same Mr. Boland, who says that Watson told him that thing, testified thus before Mr. Wrisley Brown:

Mr. BROWN. Did Watson give you any intimation of what was to become of this large excess over the $100,000?

C. G. BOLAND. No.

Mr. BROWN. You did not concern yourself about it?

C. G. BOLAND. No.

And when he was asked to explain before the Senate why it was that he made that statement to Mr. Wrisley Brown, which he now says is a lie, he said that he did not want to be drawn into the matter because Mr. Watson made that statement also regarding Mr. Loomis and Mr. Phillips, and that he had no proof that it was true. When he was put upon the stand here to testify in regard to it, he said that in the testimony he gave here he did not give the names of Mr. Phillips and Mr. Loomis, because he did not believe there was any agreement or understanding ever made that they were to get any part of that money, and yet the same thing was said about them that was said about Judge Archbald. He chooses to retail the same slander, said by a man he does not believe, against Judge Archbald in this case, though refusing to give it as against others charged by the same man at the same time, and the reason he does this I leave you to guess. So it is otherwise throughout the testimony of Mr. Boland. He says in another place that he knows nothing affecting the integrity of Judge Archbald except that which may be drawn out in relation to the $500 note which was brought to him—C. G. Boland—for discount, and he repeats that in two or three different ways. He makes no explanation of why he said that thing if it was not true, and yet the managers ask you, by innuendo, to believe that Judge Archbald was guilty of a wrong because of a statement of a man like that, who himself admits in your presence that he told an untruth about it at least three times.

I pass, Senators, away from the question of consideration. What was in fact—and this is the second point at issue under these pleadings—what was in fact the situation in relation to the Lighterage case? And, by the way, I may say here if any reference I make to the evidence in this argument is doubted by any Senator, or is challenged in any way, I shall be glad to have my attention called to it, because I have here a memorandum of the pages of the testimony covering every one of these points.

What is the true position with relation to the Lighterage case? It is true that technically that case was pending in the Commerce Court, and I may as well at the same time deal with the Fuel Rate case, though it only appertains to article No. 1, which Mr. Worthington has in charge. It is true that that case also technically was pending in the Commerce Court at the time these negotiations were carried on, but both cases were only technically pending there. I want to put that broadly, so that when Mr. Manager CLAYTON comes to reply to the argument which I am this day making he may challenge that in some way if he chooses so to do. Both of those cases had been decided in the month of May preceding the August when these negotiations commenced. It is true they were both decided on motions for preliminary injunction and that in the month of June both of those cases had been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States; but those cases both raised questions of law on undisputed facts, and the records, which were offered in your presence on Tuesday, show that beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

In the Fuel Rate case—I am not going into the facts in regard to the case, for it is wholly unnecessary to do so—the Commerce Court granted a special injunction, and the case went to the Supreme Court, which reversed the court below and entered an order that the record should be remitted to the Commerce Court with instructions to dismiss the petition.

Everybody supposed the case was at an end, so far as the Commerce Court was concerned, when it was appealed to the Supreme Court, and that it only had to be reviewed on its law in the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court agreed to that view and entered the order that I have stated. When the Lighterage case went to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Commerce Court and sent the case back for further hearing. When it came back, both the counsel for the United States and the counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission withdrew their answers, asked leave of the Commerce Court to present motions to dismiss, and elected to stand upon the motions to dismiss, thereby establishing that the facts averred in the petition were true and that there was nothing else to be considered but the law as applicable to those facts.

The opinion of Judge Carland, which is also upon this record, rendered after these proceedings commenced, and when Judge Archbald did not sit at all, states the facts just as I have stated them to you; and the Commerce Court, Judge Archbald not being present, as a matter of law, affirmed their prior ruling that the Lighterage case was properly decided theretofore. So you see that it is only in the most technical sense possible that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. had any cases then pending in the Commerce Court.

I thought I had stated, but my colleague thinks I did not, that the Lighterage case went up to the Supreme Court and was affirmed and came back again. Both cases went up at the same date, in June, 1911.

The next and the only other point in this article is the question as to whether or not Judge Archbald used his influence as a judge to assist in that settlement. He says he did not and, of course, nobody contradicts him. It is quite true, as the managers say, that it is a practical impossibility for a prosecuting officer to get into the mind of a man, and that he can only reach out by circumstantial evidence to establish such a fact. That I quite agree to, but the managers can not establish a fact by circumstantial evidence unless the circumstantial evidence, with at least reasonable certainty, moves to the establishment of the fact; and that is not the situation here.

One would have supposed from the arguments which were presented to you yesterday upon that point that Judge Archbald, or perhaps Mr. Watson, or both, were the ones who instituted the thought of making that settlement; but that is not so. I repeat that it is not so, because there are upon this record three letters offered in evidence by the managers, showing attempts to settle before Mr. Watson was even consulted, in which letters the fact is referred to that Mr. Reynolds, who was the other counsel for the Bolands, was the party being considered in connection with the question of settlement up to that time, and neither Watson nor Judge Archbald had anything whatever to do with it. But Reynolds, for some reason not necessary to consider, was not a success in bringing about a settlement; and, as Mr. C. G. Boland himself said, he feared that, unless something was done, they would lose their property, and so—it may be at the suggestion of Mr. Williams, but, at any rate, they went to Watson to get him to see if he could not effect a settlement.

What Watson does before he sees Judge Archbald I neither know nor care. He goes to Judge Archbald to see if he can not get an introduction to Mr. Loomis, who had been a neighbor of Judge Archbald in Scranton for a number of years. He gets his introduction and then the negotiations commence. There were various interviews. It is quite unnecessary to consider how many nor when they took place, but they all occurred on or after August 22, 1911. There were various interviews which Mr. Watson had with various officers of this railroad company, but he did not get very far, as they were so largely at variance in regard to the figures. He was not willing to come down far enough, nor were they willing to go up high enough, to reach even a reasonable basis for effecting a settlement. Boland says, and Watson and Judge Archbald deny, that there was on the 23d of August a meeting held in the judge's office, in which the question was spoken of as to having a writing to show that Watson was entitled to a fee of $5,000. It was denied by both Watson and Archbald that there ever was such a meeting, and Mr. Watson says he never saw that paper until it was called to his attention before the Judiciary Committee.

A great point was attempted to be made yesterday that there was a raising of the price from $100,000 to $161,000, although the amount of $100,000 was spoken of at the meeting in Judge Archbald's office, as Mr. Boland claims and the others dispute. I do not care whether that is so or not. It is as immaterial to this case as anything very well can be; but the fact is testified to by Mr. Watson on pages 1116 and 1117 and 1119 and 1120, where he sets forth just exactly how the change from $100,000 to $161,000 came to be brought about. I read from the top of page 1117:

Mr. WATSON. From the first time that the price was fixed at $100,000 the property that was to be passed had changed very materially. There were different things to be done with it, and then when they offered this property first there was no two-thirds interest offered. The Marian Coal Co. in its entirety was offered to me.

Mr. FLOYD. For $100,000?

Mr. WATSON. For $100,000. That would include the suit—well, I may say the suit; yes. There was the Peale matter; Mr. Peale had $16,000, which was admitted. Mr. Peale finally got a judgment stated for thirty-odd thousand dollars, $34,000, or something like that. Now, that was hanging fire over there, and I didn't know that that was a part of this transaction when I first undertook to handle this for $100,000. Now, there was another thing that I didn't know, and that is that one-third of this stock that represented the Marian Coal Co. was in Mr. Peale's hands and belonged to him. That is two things that I didn't know about. The first, the increased indebtedness, the $16,000, I did get an idea of before we got very far along with it. But the larger amount, this $18,000 more added to it, I did not get that, you know, until the decree was—not the decree—until the judgment was entered, which was along after I had gotten out of the matter. Now, I did not know what that litigation was. Then there was another thing that I did not know. I did not know that the Bolands had any dispute of title over there, which they did have finally, and that the Lackawanna claimed a good, sizable interest in this dump. Now, I did not know that. Then, when I brought that to Mr. Boland's attention, and he began to see his $100,000 being carved out by $16,000, by a third interest of the Peales, and by a quarter interest of the Lackawanna, it began to get him down so that he would have trouble getting home on the proceeds; and therefore we agreed or he agreed to raise that to the $161,000, and I was to make that up on the rates. That is what was to happen.

That is the situation, and that is the reason why the price was raised. No one pretends that Judge Archbald had anything whatsoever to do with it. I care not whether he knew that under the original arrangement $100,000 was to be asked and that it was afterwards raised to $161,000, or whether he only knew that $161,000 was to be asked, the result is precisely the same so far as it can in any way affect this case.

It is said, and said truly, that the judge had a later interview with Loomis on or about the 25th of September, and then on the 27th he got a letter from Loomis saying that no settlement could be made because the Bolands were asking too much; that he had an interview with Phillips at his own home on the 30th of September; that he had an interview here in Washington with Watson on or about the 7th of October; that he had a still later interview with Mr. Boland asking him to see Mr. Loomis after Watson had failed and given up the job; that he did see Loomis and found that he could not effect a settlement, and then on the 30th of November returned all the papers to Mr. Watson and told him that the settlement could not be carried through because of the vast difference between them as to the figures which the one was willing to give the other was willing to accept. Mr. Worthington asks me to read in the same connection with that which I have already read a sentence from the testimony of Mr. Watson. I read from page 1119:

I had every reason to believe perhaps it was so, and therefore we added it together and it made $161,000, and that is the only price I ever had, the only price I was ever authorized to offer the land for to the Lackawanna road, and I offered it at that price.

I may say just in this connection that there is a letter of Mr. Phillips to Mr. Loomis, both of them officers of this road, showing exactly how that $161,000 was made up, on the demand of Mr. Boland, in that it was by multiplying 376,000 tons of coal, which had been shipped from their washery over this road, by 43 cents a ton, which they claimed was the excess price charged against them, making just exactly the price which was presented to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. by him.

There is no thought or pretense that Judge Archbald had any interview with them in which anything of that kind was said, or that he had anything whatsoever to do with the sending of that letter. There were, even after Judge Archbald returned the papers to Mr. Boland—which, by the way, they never produced, because those papers would have shown the $161,000 most clearly, and it is the only letter that they did not produce themselves, although it was sent to and admittedly received by them, and although Mr. Pryor says he saw the papers which were inclosed lying on their desks, and Mr. Boland himself testified to it—there were later attempts to settle made by the Bolands themselves and Mr. Phillips went upon the stand and testified to it. I read from page 878:

Q. (By Mr. Worthington.) State any reason Mr. Christopher G. Boland gave you on that occasion for wishing to have the claim of the Marian Coal Co. against the railroad company settled.—A. He stated in a very affecting way, with tears rolling and coursing down his cheeks, that he was worried and fretting about his brother Will; that he was afraid he would lose his mind.

But it is said here that there is to be an inference drawn as against Judge Archbald unfavorably because the letters which were sent to the officials of the railroad company were written on Commerce Court paper. Mr. Manager STERLING said yesterday that they were all thus written. That is a mistake; not an intentional mistake, but none the less an actual mistake. Most of them were so written. So also most of the letters which were written to other people appearing in this case were written on Commerce Court paper. But there were a few letters written not on Commerce Court paper as well to the railroad officials as to other people. But the explanation of it, and the perfectly natural explanation of it, was that which was given by Judge Archbald when the question was put to him. He said, "I never thought anything about it. I dictated the letters to my stenographer, and she wrote the letters on that paper because it happened to be handiest, and she brought them to me and I signed them, and the letters were sent out."

I do not know how far custom has made it right for men in official position to write private and personal matters on official paper. I know that I personally have received a great many letters thus written, and on purely private business, and I know that I never heard it challenged until this case commenced, or heard it said that that was proof of any wrongdoing by anybody.

I recall reading in sacred history that some 19 centuries ago the scribes and pharisees brought before Christ a woman who was taken in adultery, and they tempted Him, asking Him what should be done with that woman. The Sacred Book tells us He stooped down and wrote with His finger upon the ground. And when the men who brought her there saw what was written upon the ground they all went away without making any accusation against her. Tradition says that that which was there written upon the ground contained the names of those with whom that woman's accusers had themselves committed adultery.

I wonder whether or not if that same inerrant finger could come here this day and write upon the walls of this Chamber, if, indeed, those walls are vast enough for that purpose, the names of those to whom Judge Archbald's accusers had written on private business upon official stationery, how many of those accusers, like the scribes and pharisees of old, would quietly slide away, not waiting to hear "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone."

But it was said that the pendency of the Peale case had something to do with it. That case was pending in Judge Archbald's court, and they say that he had no business to undertake to act in this matter because of the pendency of that case. But, gentlemen, it is an admitted fact, entirely outside of the facts to which I have already called your attention, that there was nothing done in that case which was in any way improper. I read from page 933, where objection was made to an offer of proof by Mr. Fitzgerald, who was one of the counsel in the case, because there was no claim of improper conduct. The Presiding Officer ruled that:

The Chair remembers there is no issue raised in the articles of impeachment as to the improper conduct of Judge Archbald in this particular case.

And, again:

If the facts indicated by the question were established by the evidence, it would not affect the case in any manner, because there is no charge in the articles of impeachment of any improper conduct of Judge Archbald in that particular case, as the Chair recollects.

And that admission on behalf of the managers answers so completely the wild statements which were made by William P. Boland when upon the witness stand, namely, that the judge did influence Judge Witmer to make a wrongful decision, and that the judge decided the demurrer in the case because of their refusal to discount the note, although the note was not drawn for months after the decision was rendered—that admission on behalf of the managers takes that matter so far out of this case that it is not worthy of further consideration.

I think, so far as article 2 is concerned, we are now in a position to summarize it without going far astray as to the result. We have here admittedly a judge of integrity—of integrity as a judge and as a man—impartial in all he did, who never undertook to sit in any case, even as to these litigants, after he had undertaken to settle their controversy; who is able, industrious, and impartial; and you are asked to say that that man is corrupt and dishonest and ought to be removed simply because he undertakes at the behest of one friend to settle the difficulty which another friend is in. I want to know what the Members of this Senate would do if they were in the position in which Judge Archbald was, as stated by him. I read from page 1195:

I had known Mr. Boland 30 or 40 years; I can not tell just how long. I knew him familiarly enough to speak of him by his name. People call him "Christy." I talked with him in a friendly and familiar way every time we met. He came to me in my office on one occasion—I can not fix the exact date; I have no means of doing it—and told me about this settlement. He said that the matter was preying on the mind of his brother, W. P. Boland, and he expected if it went on further that it would end in his brother going to an asylum. My impression is that tears came to his eyes, and he drew upon my sympathy in that way by what he said and in his appearance. He asked and spoke about this settlement, and wanted me to see what I could do with regard to it. He came two or three other times in a similar way at a later date. I can not fix the time when that occurred.

I want to know, gentlemen, if a friend of yours of 30 or 40 years' standing had come to you and said that thing to you what would you have done? Mind you, C. G. Boland was called upon the stand as a witness after that testimony was given and never undertook to dispute it in the slightest degree. What would you have done? I believe as long as red blood flows in your veins you would have done just what Judge Archbald did. You would have gone out at the behest of a friend of that kind and you would have striven to settle the difficulty which so seriously threatened the mind and memory of that friend's brother. And there could be drawn as against you for doing that thing nothing whatsoever; but in your favor, many, many things.

If Judge Archbald had endeavored to sit in that case after that time, there might have been some slight shadow of a complaint; but there is no pretense of that thing. He exercised his manhood rights; he played the part of a Christian as he was required to play it, and instead of being condemned he should be praised.

I recall that in the Sermon on the Mount we are told that "blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." But if a man were in Federal office and should be deprived of the right to do that thing, then must it be said that "cursed are the peacemakers who are in the Federal service, for they shall be impeached for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors"; and nothing less than that can be said in regard to it.

I pass, gentlemen, to the fourth article. That article has attracted more attention in the Senate, if one may judge by the number of question that were submitted to Judge Archbald when upon the witness stand, than any of the other articles.

I shall not undertake to claim here that that which Judge Archbald did on that occasion could not better have been done otherwise. I think it could. But that is not the question. The question here is whether that which he did constitutes a high crime and misdemeanor. And there is no other question than that in it. And unless you find that it does constitute a high crime and misdemeanor, however much you may regret and reprobate that which was in fact done, you must find a verdict of not guilty upon this article.

Let us see what the case is. The New Orleans Board of Trade had suggested and finally instigated proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission growing out of freight rates on the Louisville & Nashville road, from New Orleans to Montgomery, by one route through Pensacola and by another route through Mobile. The Interstate Commerce Commission had early adopted for their guidance the rule that if the through rate for freight between two points was greater than the sum total of the local rates between the points that that, if not conclusive, certainly was a most violent presumption to establish the fact that the through rate was an improper rate and ought to be reduced.

When that rule was promulgated the Louisville & Nashville, which was up against water competition as to a part of its route, in order to comply with the requirements of the commission, changed the rates so that the through rate did coincide with the sum total of the local rates. That settled the proceedings for a little while, but later on they were instituted and carried on in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and there were two questions raised in those proceedings; the first related to what are known as class rates and the second to that which are known as commodity rates.

"Class rates," as Judge Archbald explained the other day, means rates upon a number of, comparatively speaking, similar articles. "Commodity rates" means rates upon an individual article, because it is supposed to be more expensive to transport than other articles.

And when the Interstate Commerce Commission came to pass upon the matter they decided only one branch of it. As the papers which related to that were not read when they were introduced in evidence, I think it important, that there may be a proper comprehension of exactly what the situation is, that you may know just what the Interstate Commerce Commission did decide, and I will read now from the concluding clause of their opinion in this case:

In regard to the commodity rates attacked in these proceedings, certain adjustments and changes have been made therein by the defendant since the institution thereof with the view of correcting inequalities or excessive charges found to exist, which adjustments and changes are admitted to have removed the cause of complaint to some extent. It is impracticable in the present state of the record to determine satisfactorily what other changes, if any, respecting commodity rates should be made. These cases will be retained therefore for such further investigation and consideration of commodity rates involved as the facts and circumstances may seem to require.

So that, you see, in the case pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission they decided the question of class rates and they reserved the decision as to commodity rates, and in that aspect of the matter the Louisville & Nashville Railroad filed their petition in the circuit court of the United States, which proceedings were subsequently certified to the Commerce Court at the time of its creation and became the first case in that court.

Of course that petition could only attack the ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission in relation to class rates, because there was still pending and undecided the question of commodity rates. That is all it did attack. While it was in that shape Judge Archbald told you—and about that there is no dispute—that the Commerce Court, in considering the matter, reached the conclusion that they would sustain the ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Judge Archbald did not agree with that conclusion and undertook to write a dissenting opinion. In the course of that undertaking he found the particular clause in the testimony which had been quoted—and I am not going to stop to read it, for it is not worth while—by which, judging that by the context, it would appear as if the word "not" had been omitted. And it was in that aspect of the matter he wrote to Mr. Bruce to obtain the fact upon the point, so that he might use it in connection with his dissenting opinion.

It may be said that the elimination of the word "not" was a very important elimination, and in a sense it would be so; and yet, curiously enough, in this record before the Senate we have no less than four instances where the word "not" has been omitted in the printed proceedings, which had to be corrected by calling the attention of the Senate to it, after the reading of the Journal. And it finally appears omitted in the brief which Mr. Manager CLAYTON has filed and that has not been corrected, and the "not" is still omitted up to this day. So it plays very little part whether the word "not" was omitted or whether any other word was omitted.

So if you choose you may say that it was a blunder or mistake, or any word you choose to attach to it, on the part of Judge Archbald not to call attention of counsel on the other side, and also call the attention of the other judges of the court to the receipt of that letter from Mr. Bruce. Call it that if you choose.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Will you please give me the page of the brief in which the error to which you have referred occurs?

Mr. SIMPSON. Page 7. I will call attention to the exact point later on if you wish.

The question is not whether that was a mistake on his part, but whether there was an evil motive in that mistake. There can not have been an evil motive in that mistake, because it is an admitted fact in this case, which probably the Senators have forgotten, but which was admitted when Mr. Bruce was on the witness stand, that that letter which was received by Judge Archbald was pasted by him into the record in that case and remains in that record unto this day, and is printed in the paper book in the Supreme Court, where that case is now pending.

Now, can anyone under God's heaven imagine that there could be an evil motive in a man writing and receiving a letter when that man would paste that letter into the record where everybody could see it?

I do not know whether or not that is how the managers found out in regard to it, but that is the fact, and it negatives in the most conclusive way the possibility of any evil motive in regard to it.

The same thing is true, only in a somewhat different sense, of the second letter that Judge Archbald wrote. That letter was calling attention to that which Judge Mack had discovered, or thought he had discovered, of what are known as variations from the Cooley award. But those variations related purely and simply to the commodity rates which had never been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commision, and therefore were not before the Commerce Court.

And so it was that when Mr. Bruce replied to Judge Archbald in regard to the matter, he called attention to that identical fact, and I shall read only a few lines from the letter to demonstrate that:

> Finding that the commission had decided nothing on the subject of commodity rates, but had expressly reserved that subject for further consideration, and that the equity suit filed by the railroad company attacking the commission's order was therefore necessarily confined to the subject of class rates, to which the commission's order was confined, I never attempted to make any investigation of the subject of commodity rates or to make any preparation of the case based upon the consideration of them; and I do not see how any question pertaining to commodity rates can now be before the Commerce Court.

Of course, no such question was before that court, and it was quite unnecessary, however wise it might have been to call the attention of the court to that fact by producing the letter, especially as according to the statement of Judge Archbald the thing became wholly immaterial in the consideration of the case.

But if that thing was something which he should not have done, it was at most a breach of the law of ethics. It was no breach of any known law of the land. It was no more a breach of ethics on the part of Judge Archbald than it was a breach of ethics on the part of Mr. Bruce himself, for he testified, when he was before you, that he did not communicate the facts to counsel on the other side, and he testified also—and it is in this record—that he got a letter from Judge Mack, who was writing the dissenting opinion, and he replied to that also.

I do not know how many Senators there are in this Chamber who know Mr. Bruce. Probably both of the Senators from Kentucky do know him. If they do know him, I am quite sure they will say to you, as one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of this country said not very long ago, that he is one of the very best lawyers, one of the highest-toned lawyers, that ever came to practice at their bar. If a man of that character should commit a breach of the law of ethics, why complain of Judge Archbald and claim that it is a crime that he did likewise?

I want, in that same connection, and closing all that I have to say upon that point, to read to you what was said by Mr. Manager STERLING yesterday. I read from page 1361:

> Do you ask the question, Would you impeach and convict Judge Archbald and remove him from office for his correspondence with Helm Bruce? I speak for myself when I say no; I would not if that stood alone, but it is a part of the system; it is one fact which dovetails into this line of conduct which he has carried on with the railroads, and it is a system so rank that "it smells to heaven."

He may say that as much as he pleases. The point in it, however, is this: That when you come to vote on the fourth article of impeachment you are only to determine under that article as it is expressed whether or not the sending of those letters to and the receiving of the letters from Mr. Bruce, without notice to counsel on the other side, is an impeachable offense.

You can not carry into your decision as to the fourth article anything which relates to any system, if such there be. To do so would contravene the very first fundamental principle of a trial, namely, that a man shall be convicted only of that which is charged against him. And so little did the managers of the House think of it as an element in itself that they did not even include it in their dragnet thirteenth article at all. It is not even suggested there, and hence to claim that it is part of a "system" is simply a claim not to be considered at all.

I pass on to the fifth article. I am afraid my colleague is or should be getting nervous for fear I will use a part of his time.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Take all the time you want.

Mr. SIMPSON. The fifth article Mr. Manager FLOYD said yesterday he considered was one of the most important of them all. I think it was Mr. FLOYD who made the statement; but if not, it was one of the others, but I think it was Mr. FLOYD. And yet that article is one of the simplest of them all.

The charge in that article is that Mr. Frederick Warnke in 1904 was the owner of a two-thirds interest in certain coal lands owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., and the railroad company forfeited the lease which Mr. Warnke had, and that he afterwards went to Judge Archbald and asked him, Judge Archbald, to intercede with the officials of the Reading Railroad Co., and in consideration of that intercession Judge Archbald received the sum of $510.

Now, that is the substance of that charge. I do not care about taking the time to read it at length.

You will perceive at once, therefore, that all the evidence which was introduced here by the managers which related to the arrangements existing between John Henry Jones and Fred W. Jones, and whatever agreements there may have been between them are wholly immaterial to the consideration of this article. You will perceive also that under that article, unless that $510 note was given as a consideration for Judge Archbald using his influence with the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., it does not make any difference for what it was given. It is not charged to be anyways wrong, if, as the fact was, it was a commission for the sale to the Premier Coal Co. by the Lacoe & Shiffer Coal Co. of the fill known as the old gravity fill, for in that event it is not a subject of complaint in this article.

Let us see what the facts are. It is undoubtedly true that there was an interest which Mr. Warnke had in a lease with the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. It is not questioned here but that he had expended $65,000 to $75,000 in rebuilding the washery and getting ready to wash the coal that was in the dump. It is not questioned here but that the original lease, of which he was the assignee, had a clause in it that if there was an assignment of the lease the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had the right to forfeit the lease; and there is no doubt but that—cruelly, as I think, though within their legal right—they did forfeit the lease because of that assignment, and that Mr. Warnke lost his $65,000 to $75,000. There is no doubt, also, but that he undertook, through himself and through other friends of his, to induce Mr. Richards, of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to reconsider that determination and to try to get back the lease which he had had or to lease to him the Lincoln coal dump, so that he might in some degree recoup a portion of his losses.

There is no doubt but that he came to Judge Archbald, that he told Judge Archbald the story of his losses, and that he asked the judge if he would not go to Mr. Richards and see if he, the judge, could not get for him, Warnke, an interview with Richards, to the end that he might endeavor again to persuade Mr. Richards to yield the point and give him back the washery or give him the Lincoln dump, so that he might recoup his money.

There is no doubt about the fact that Judge Archbald, then being about a visit to Pottsville, wrote a letter, in which letter he said he was coming to Pottsville on a certain day, and he asked Mr. Richards if he could not see him; that he saw Mr. Richards and then put the proposition before Mr. Richards; and that he then for the first time learned that Mr. Richards had been previously importuned to grant that relief to Mr. Warnke, and that then for the first time he also learned that like the laws of the Medes and Persians the rules of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. can not be altered, and they would not consider anything Mr. Warnke might have to say.

All those things are without any dispute. But is there any crime in that? Is there any wrongdoing in that? It is not even alleged that the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, or Railway, or Coal & Iron Co. had any litigation pending before any court of which Judge Archbald was a member. That was admitted in the argument made here yesterday.

What they say—and it is one of the most curious arguments I ever listened to—that because in the sale of the gravity fill he did take a commission and wanted to know "why not"; that you might infer from that fact alone that the note which was given to him on this occasion was given to him as a consideration for trying to help Mr. Warnke. This to me is one of the most curious arguments that anyone could bring before any body of men supposed to be sitting as judges, especially as months of time even had intervened before the note was given.

But there is no evidence whatsoever that that note was given at all for any such purpose. There have been before you no less than five witnesses, every one of whom testified that that note was given as a commission on the sale of the old gravity fill. There is no doubt, because there has been here produced before you the letters by Mr. Berry and others, that Judge Archbald had an option upon the old gravity fill. There is no doubt that he undertook to sell that to the Central Brewing Co., and that they sent and examined it and for reasons satisfactory to themselves said that they would not take it. There is no doubt that the examination which was made for that brewing company was made by Mr. Warnke, and that he became satisfied from the examination which he then made that there was sufficient value in that fill for him to buy it; and that he then entered upon negotiations with Judge Archbald, while he still held that option, for the purchase of that fill.

It is true that while those negotiations went on the original option ran out. There was still, however, the oral option. But whether there was a written or oral option makes absolutely no difference. Under the law of Pennsylvania, whatever may be the law elsewhere, if an agent or commission man brings the parties together and that results finally in a contract, it makes no difference whether that man has anything to do with the final making of the contract, whether his agency ceases in the meantime or no, or what could happen to it, having once brought the parties together resulting in a contract, he has done all that the law requires of him, and he is entitled to be paid his commission.

That is the reason why the commission was paid to Judge Archbald in this case, and that is the reason why he was entitled to retain so much of it as he did in fact retain. Of course, he gave half of it to Mr. Jones, who was interested in the matter with him, and he produced his checks and check stubs showing that identical fact, and it is a conceded fact throughout the case.

Now, I want to know what you are going to do under circumstances such as these with the presumption of innocence to which I heretofore have adverted, and to the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and to the effect to be given to good character, when upon such an argument as was made yesterday by the managers in regard to it you are asked to charge Judge Archbald with crime, as against the testimony of at least six witnesses, without one single word from anybody in antagonism to that which those witnesses have said.

I pass to the seventh article. The allegation in that article in regard to Judge Archbald is that while he was sitting as a judge in the district court—that brings up a new question of law which I am going to refer to in a moment—he entered into negotiations with one W. W. Rissinger in relation to a coal-mining scheme, I think it was in Venezuela, and that while those negotiations were going on he tried the case of the Old Plymouth Coal Co., in which Rissinger was a stockholder, against various insurance companies, and that while also that matter was pending he indorsed a note for $2,500 at the request of Mr. Rissinger and caused it to be presented to Mr. Lenahan, who was one of the counsel for Mr. Rissinger in the trial of that particular suit.

The first question which arises is the one which has been referred to by several of the managers, and was suggested, I think, by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in the beginning of this trial, viz, whether or not the Senate can now consider an article of impeachment which relates to acts done while Judge Archbald was a district judge before his appointment to and confirmation as a judge of the Commerce Court. I shall not take much time to argue that legal question for the reason that all of the articles, beginning at the seventh and running to the twelfth, which deal with this question are articles of comparative unimportance. But inasmuch as the question has been raised, it ought to be considered, and so, briefly, I shall consider it. The managers in their brief say this in referring to this question:

> In this respect the case here presented seems to be unique in the annals of impeachment proceedings under our Constitution.

And they say further in that regard that they can justify the articles of impeachment, notwithstanding the change of office, because the two offices are substantially the same within the contemplation of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachments.

That argument necessarily concedes the points decided in the Blount case and considered and voted upon in the Belknap case, that he who is out of office can no longer be impeached. It necessarily also concedes that the constitutional provision has for its primary purpose the removal of the delinquent from the particular office in which he is said to have done a wrong. That is the necessary conclusion from the provision of Article I, section 3, of the Constitution, which provides what shall be the penalty in case of impeachment. It is considered also by Judge Story in his work on the Constitution, and I wish to read a paragraph in regard to it, even though it takes a little time to do it. In referring to the clause of the Constitution to which I have adverted Judge Story says:

> From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that Kingdom all the King's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners can not now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kinds of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual ground for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office. In such a government all the citizens are equal and ought to have the same security of a trial by jury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character. To subject them to impeachment would not only be extremely oppressive and expensive, but would endanger their lives and liberties by exposing them against their wills to persecution for their conduct in exercising their political rights and privileges. Dear as the trial by jury justly is in civil cases, its value as a protection against the resentment and violence of rulers and factions in criminal prosecutions makes it inestimable. It is there, and there only, that a citizen, in the sympathy, impartiality, the intelligence, and incorruptible integrity of his fellows impaneled to try the accusation, may indulge a well-founded confidence and sustain and cheer him. If he choose to accept office, he would voluntarily incur all the additional responsibility growing out of it. If impeached for his conduct while in office, he could not justly complain, since he was placed in that predicament by his own choice, and in accepting office he submitted to all the consequences. Indeed, the moment it was decided that the judgment upon impeachment should be limited to removal and disqualification from office it followed, as a natural result, that it ought not to reach any but officers of the United States. It seems to have been the original object of the friends of the National Government to confine it to these limits, for in the original resolutions proposed to the convention and in all the subsequent proceedings the power was expressly limited to national officers.

If the argument which was thus presented by Judge Story is sound, it must necessarily follow that the similarity of the two offices is not and can not be of any moment whatsoever. Can it be said that if a civil officer, say, in the Cabinet of the President, is transferred from one portfolio to the other and continues steadily in office that he may be impeached while holding the second office for that which was done in the first; and yet if he passes from the Cabinet to the Senate or into private life he can not be impeached at all? There is no logic or sound reasoning in any such proposition as that, nor is it in accord with any well-settled principles. In the provision which the managers quote in their brief from Mr. Foster he says this in regard to that:

> It includes such action by an officer when acting as a member ex officio of a board of commissioners, and such action in the same or a similar office at an immediately preceding term.

Now, I want to know why limit it to the immediately preceding term if the similarity of the office is the test in determining whether the impeachment will lie or not. Of course, that can not be sound; and the only reason why Foster wrote in his commentaries the "immediately preceding term" was because he felt that the line must be drawn somewhere. He knew that in certain of the State courts, under the language of their constitutions, it had been held that in a succeeding term of the same office there might be an impeachment for that which occurred in the immediately preceding term. But it remained for the managers to evolve the doctrine that it was to be a substantially similar office which was the test in determining the matter.

I submit that the proper test is the one to which I have already adverted. It is that the office, during the incumbency of which the acts were done of which complaint was made, shall be the determinative factor in deciding whether or not impeachment shall lie for the offense charged. If that is not so, there is no logical conclusion from the position which one of the managers assumed (I think it was Mr. Manager Sterling, though I may be mistaken about that), that so long as the man is in public office, whether the office is substantially similar or no, or whether there is a continuity of term or no—so long as he is in public office he may be impeached for anything which he has ever done in the past because, as it was claimed, the purpose of the constitutional provision is to put out of office all those who by their past lives have shown that they are unfit to occupy it. That position would be a logical one, but there can not be a case found to sustain it; and all the authorities decide precisely the reverse. But, as I said, that is a comparatively unimportant matter, and I pass from it to consider what the real charge is.

That real charge is that Judge Archbald was corrupt in sitting at the trial of that case while negotiations were pending as to a matter in which he was interested, and in causing the note, while the matter was pending, to be presented for discount to counsel for one of the parties to the litigation. It is impossible to conceive that that can be so. There can not be a corrupt conspiracy unless there were at least two people to it. If there was a conspiracy between Judge Archbald and Mr. Rissinger, will somebody tell me why when those suits were brought they were not brought in Judge Archbald's court? Yet the record which is here produced shows they were not. They were brought in the common pleas court of Lackawanna County, Pa., over which Judge Archbald did not preside.

Can anyone understand why the other party to the suits, the one who was to be injured, should remove the case into the Federal court over which Judge Archbald was to preside if the conspiracy was between Judge Archbald and Rissinger?

Can anyone understand why, if there was a conspiracy between Judge Archbald and Rissinger in regard to the matter, the rulings, so far as they took place, with one exception, to which I will advert in a moment, were all in favor of the other party to the litigation? Yet Mr. Shattuck, when he was upon the witness stand, and he was counsel for the insurance company which was supposed in some way to have been injured, testified that every decision in the case, barring the one, was made in accordance with his suggestions to the court and as against Mr. Lenahan's and Mr. Rissinger's claim.

The one to which I now wish to advert is this: When all the evidence for the plaintiff was in the counsel for the defendant, Mr. Shattuck, moved for a nonsuit, not a demurrer to the evidence, for that is not known to the practice in Pennsylvania, though the legal effect is precisely the same. He moved for a nonsuit, and the court refused to grant the nonsuit. They said it was a case for a jury, and, as Mr. Shattuck said, it was a case for the jury upon a single question, which single question was whether the building which had been burned down belonged to the old Plymouth Coal Co., which was operating the washery, or belonged to the railroad company, which owned the dump, the building having from time to time been altered and added to by the old Plymouth Coal Co. during the course of their washery proceedings.

When they had gone on a little way in the evidence counsel got together and agreed upon a settlement of the case, which was carried into effect. There is no claim here, and it is distinctly denied in the evidence, that Judge Archbald had anything whatsoever to do with bringing the counsel together. It is not claimed here; on the contrary, it is admitted by the managers by an express admission, and it is also testified to by Mr. Lenahan, representing the coal company, and by Mr. Shattuck, representing the insurance company, that the decision which Judge Archbald made upon that point was right; and Mr. Lenahan told you that Mr. Shattuck turned to him after the decision of the case and said to him in substance, "The jig is up," and that he had had no defense whatsoever, and Mr. Lenahan further said to you that there really was no defense of any kind to the case.

Now, I ask whether or not on that state of facts you can find anything wrong as against Judge Archbald? As I said, Mr. Manager STERLING admitted during the trial that every ruling was proper—every one, without an exception.

Oh, but they say Judge Archbald permitted that note to be presented to Mr. Lenahan for discount. Judge Archbald says that he did not. Mr. Lenahan does not say that he did. Mr. Rissinger says that he did not. Indeed, there is a slight dispute between Rissinger and Lenahan as to whether the note was ever presented to Mr. Lenahan. Certainly if it was presented at all it was presented in the most indefinite sort of a way. Lenahan admits he never saw it. Rissinger says that what occurred was that he went to Lenahan, not even having the note with him, and asked him whether he would have his bank discount that note, and Lenahan says, "I said to him 'What do you want it for?' He told me he wanted it for raising money in relation to this mining scheme down in Honduras," or in Venezuela, wherever it was, and that then he, Lenahan, said to him, "Why, I will not go to my bank and discount a note for any such purpose as that. They would laugh me away if I did anything like that, because they will not discount a note for the purpose of using money in any mining scheme of a wildcat nature whatever."

Knowing of the entire failure of their evidence, there was an endeavor yesterday to drag in Mr. Rissinger's testimony before the Judiciary Committee, though it was never even referred to at the trial in this case, and to assert that his stories, as testified to on the two occasions, were wholly at variance. Even if that were so, though there is no evidence to show it, it is inconceivable how Judge Archbald could be affected by it.

There is just one other thing in that aspect of the matter which ought to be referred to. Before the note was presented to anybody, indeed before it was indorsed by Judge Archbald, there had final judgment been entered in the suit about which this complaint is made, five days before that day, and the record which is produced and offered in evidence here shows that fact to be true. Now, I ask, Is Judge Archbald to be charged with some crime or with some wrongdoing because as an accommodation to a friend he indorsed that friend's note five days or any other time after the only litigation in which that friend had any interest was finally settled in his, Judge Archbald's, court? If he is to be blamed for that, will somebody kindly let me know what the statute of limitations upon that point is? I want to know when a judge having disposed of litigation in which a party is interested can for the first time be permitted to have anything to do with that one who had in the past been a litigant in his court. Is it five days or five years or five centuries? In point of fact, the test is, and necessarily must be, the point when final judgment is entered in the case. At that time the judge's function is at an end; the case is over so far as the judge is concerned; and the question is simply one of collection between the parties to the litigation.

I pass to articles 8 and 9, and I refer to them together because they both grow out of precisely the same transaction. Judge Archbald indorsed a note for $500 for John Henry Jones. The eighth article charges him with a crime because he permitted that note to be presented to C. G. Boland and William P. Boland for discount, there then being pending in his court the case of Peale against the Marian Coal Co., in which company the two Bolands were large stockholders. The ninth article charges him with a crime because he permitted that note, or directed that note, if you choose—I am not caring for the wording in regard to it—to be presented to C. H. Von Storch, who some time in the past had been a litigant in his court. That is the gravamen of those two complaints.

It is alleged also in those articles that the note was given for the purchase of an interest in an oil concession in Venezuela.

The facts in regard to those articles can very easily be considered together. There is no doubt that Mr. Jones did have an interest in an oil concession in Venezuela; there is no doubt he came with this note to Judge Archbald and asked him to indorse it, and that the judge did indorse it. Up to that point the evidence is clear. There is no doubt also that Mr. Jones took that note and presented it to his bank for discount, and that that bank refused to discount it because a couple of other notes, upon which Mr. Jones was indorser, had been protested for nonpayment on account of the failure of the maker of those notes. There is no doubt also that Mr. Edward J. Williams, who figures in the first article, then suggested to Mr. Jones that the Bolands would discount the note; that he took it to the Bolands and asked them to discount it, and that they refused to discount it, they, say, upon high moral grounds. I am not going to enter into any controversy as to whether their grounds were good, bad, or indifferent. Williams had the note for three days. He then took it to another bank, and they, for some unknown reason, refused to discount it, and he then returned it to Jones. Then it was suggested that Mr. Von Storch's bank might discount it. T. Ellsworth Davies, I think, was the party who suggested that to Mr. Jones, and Mr. Jones and Mr. Davies then went to Mr. Von Storch, and Davies introduced Jones. Von Storch said, "Leave the note here until I look into the matter." He subsequently called up Judge Archbald on the phone and asked him if it was his note. Finding that it was, he directed that it be discounted. It was discounted, and Jones got all the money.

Those are the undisputed facts. If you add to those the disputed facts they still make no crime. The utmost that can be said in regard to it is that the judge, knowing that the note was to be presented to the Bolands, permitted it to be done. Well, suppose he did permit it to be done. Neither of the Bolands nor Williams nor Jones nor anybody claims that he asked them to discount it, or did the slightest thing in regard to it. He says and Jones says that it was presented to the Bolands without Judge Archbald knowing anything whatsoever about it; and Boland himself says that, though Williams told him that Judge Archbald knew that it was going to be presented, he, Boland, did not know whether that was true or not, and they did not have faith enough in Williams to believe it was true. Judge Archbald says that he did not do that thing, and there you have it. How are you going to build a crime out of that? The Bolands admit that they never spoke to the judge in any way whatsoever about it. It came out in the hearing before the Judiciary Committee as a surprise to the judge, except for the fact that the judge says that at some time, the date of which he can not fix, Jones told him that Williams had presented the note to the Bolands and that they had refused to discount it. That is the whole case upon that point. Is that a crime?

Is what occurred in relation to Von Storch any more of a crime? Mind you, Von Storch had had a case before Judge Archbald which Judge Archbald had partially decided against him and partially in his favor; but that case had been finally settled nearly a year before—11 good months before—the judgment had been paid and satisfied, and that was the end of that case for good. The docket entries show that to be so. Is there, can there, be anything further upon which you can draw any inference or wrong of any kind or character in regard to that transaction?

It is said, however, in this article that the reason they make complaint against Judge Archbald in regard to it is that he permitted this thing to be done in this way, this presentation of this note to persons who were litigants in his court and to persons who had been litigants in his court, because he knew the note could not be discounted in the usual commercial channels, and that, therefore, you are to draw the inference of wrong in regard to it. They offer no evidence at all upon that point. On the contrary, you will remember that when one of the witnesses was upon the stand—Mr. Ruth, I think—he said that Judge Archbald's credit was perfectly good, and that their bank would be willing to discount his note. You have the facts before you, that whenever a note was presented or wherever it was presented, every note that he did indorse was, in fact, discounted by some bank; and you have his testimony in regard to it and the testimony of two or three other witnesses, Mr. Scarle, notably, that his credit was good throughout Scranton at any bank. There was no suggestion, as my colleague suggests, that any note of Judge Archbald's, or any note upon which he was maker or indorser, had ever at any time or under any circumstances been dishonored. I want to ask you, therefore, how you can draw from these facts, which are wholly undisputed, any conclusion that his note would not be discounted in the usual commercial channels? Yet that is the necessary basis of the claim which is being made in these two articles.

I now pass to an article which I confess causes my gorge to rise more than any other article of them all. It is charged in the tenth article that in 1910, while Judge Archbald was a judge of the district court for the middle district of Pennsylvania, he accepted an invitation of Henry W. Cannon to take a trip to Europe at the expense of Mr. Cannon; that at that time Mr. Cannon was a director of or interested in a number of corporations, which are named in the article, which corporations were likely to have litigation in Judge Archbald's court; that Judge Archbald knew that fact, and that, therefore, it was a misdemeanor on his part to accept that favor from Mr. Cannon.

Now, what are the facts touching that article? They are wholly undisputed, and they were admitted yesterday, I think, in the argument of Mr. Manager STERLING, to be wholly undisputed. The fact is that Mr. Cannon is a first cousin to Mrs. Archbald; that they were reared together; that the closest friendship had existed between them from the time of their childhood down to the present time; that Mr. Cannon some 10 or 12 years ago had begun to withdraw from active business; that he had purchased a winter place in Italy, where he was in the habit of going from time to time; that he had on repeated occasions before this requested that Mrs. Archbald should go with him and spend a portion of the winter in that home; that they had been unable to make the arrangement; and that now the time had become ripe. So Mr. Cannon wrote a letter, which has been offered in evidence in this case, in which he suggests that Mrs. Archbald shall go with him and spend a portion of the winter in that home in Florence, with her daughter or her son, or, as he says in the letter, if the judge can go, better still with the judge. They accepted that invitation; they went to Florence; they spent several months on that trip; and it was all at the expense of Mr. Cannon. The judge says—and no one contradicts it, for the managers were absolutely silent on that point—that the only corporations which Judge Archbald knew that Mr. Cannon was in any way connected with were the Great Northern Railroad and certain corporations on the Pacific coast.

Now, I want to know how, in the first place, the Great Northern Railroad, or any corporations on the Pacific coast, were likely to become litigants in the middle district of Pennsylvania. I want to know, even if they were likely to become litigants in the middle district of Pennsylvania, how that fact could deter Judge Archbald from accepting that invitation at the hands of his wife's relative, when there is neither allegation nor proof that he ever sat in any case in which Mr. Cannon was interested, or that any corporation in which Mr. Cannon was interested had ever had a case in his court or was ever likely to have one in it. Why should the managers, for the purpose of this article, charge that there was likely to be such a case? Of course they were bound to charge that, otherwise the article would fall of its own weight.

I want also to know what difference there is whether a judge of a court accepts an invitation from his wife's relative to spend a portion of the winter in Florence or whether he accepts that invitation to spend a week end in Philadelphia or in Washington or in Scranton or anywhere else. When a man becomes a judge, is he required to at once withdraw from all the social amenities of life with his and his wife's relatives, because, perchance, they may become litigants in his court? Is he compelled to ostracize himself from all his relations because of that possibility? Yet that is the gravamen of this complaint; and unless that is in it there is nothing in it. Judge Archbald had a perfect right to do just exactly what he did; and there is in the Revised Statutes of the United States an exact provision to meet such a case, viz, for the calling in of another judge to try such a case should it ever arise.

I do not believe—if I may follow the bad example set by the managers yesterday of expressing my own belief instead of arguing from the evidence—I do not believe that Judge Archbald would have sat in any case in which Mr. Cannon was interested if it had come into his court, whether he took that trip to Florence or whether he did not; but the wrong, if any there was, would have been in sitting in the case under such circumstances; and there is no pretense that he ever did so or ever had the opportunity to do so.

So, when he had a wife who had been sick as long as Mrs. Archbald had been, and when, as she testified before you, not only her happiness but her comfort would be so greatly enhanced if he could go along, because he knew just what to do when her troubles came—was he to stay away and let her go alone in that condition or be charged with crime because he went? If there is a man in this Senate who thinks there is the slightest element of a crime in that he has indeed a strange idea of the position of men in this world.

I pass to article 11, which is termed the "purse article." It appears that when Judge Archbald was starting on the trip to Europe, to which I have already adverted, Judge Searle, of Wayne County, Pa., handed him a sealed envelope. On the outside of that envelope was written, "Hon. R. W. Archbald. Sailing orders: Not to be opened until two days at sea." Judge Archbald, when it was presented to him, said to Judge Searle, "What does this mean?" The response came: "A good sailor obeys orders." That letter was opened by Judge Archbald after the vessel had sailed, and then for the first time he learned that there was in it a sum of money contributed by a number of lawyers and ex-lawyers living in his district as a gift to him. He could not then return the money. He had to do one of two things, and Mr. Munson very accurately stated the difficulty under which he was placed by that situation, though Mr. Munson himself did not contribute for reasons which were satisfactory to him. I desire to read from Mr. Munson's testimony, because it explains quite accurately the position in which Judge Archbald found himself:

Q. Will you tell us why you declined to pay the money?—A. I had then, and still have, a high repect and admiration for Judge Archbald and I did not care to embarrass him to either accept or refuse it. That was my reason.

Q. You thought that no matter which course was taken he would be embarrassed in either aspect of it?—A. I thought so; that he would be very much embarrassed. I want to say, if I may be allowed to say it, as I said before, that I have tried many cases before Judge Archbald, both when he was a State judge and when he was a Federal judge. He was always absolutely impartial and fair and I have never tried a case before a more honorable, upright judge than he. I have regarded him as my friend. I knew him when he was a lawyer. He was my correspondent in Scranton. I have tried cases before him for 25 years.

And Mr. Sprout, when upon the stand, testified that when Judge Archbald acknowledged to him the contribution which he made, the letter which was written showed that the judge was very much embarrassed by the situation in which he was placed. What could he do? If he had returned that money, he stood in the position, practically, of slapping every one of those men in the face; he stood in the position, practically, of saying to them, "You have wrongfully endeavored to give me a sum of money; the wrong is yours, and therefore I return this money to you." Would any man want to do that? Most certainly not.

The wrong which was in fact done was, as has been expressed by at least six of the witnesses who testified in regard to this matter, the wrong of Mr. Edward R. W. Searle, who, in violation of that which was arranged, put in the letter which was sent to Judge Archbald inclosing that money a list of the names of the contributors. If that had not been done, if it had been simply a gift of money, certainly nobody could have been heard here to complain. But even then it is a difference in degree and not in kind whether, when a judge is about to sail abroad, there is sent to him a gift of money, such as there was in this case, or a gift of flowers or of books or of anything else.

I ask whether or not it would be suggested or thought that there was any wrong in the sending or the reception of such gifts as those when a judge travels abroad? I do not suppose you would have ever heard of it under such circumstances, but because the gift happened to be money, instead of other things of value, the charge is made that it is a criminal offense. If it were followed by evidence suggesting in the slightest degree that Judge Archbald had shown any favors to anybody by virtue of that gift, or if it were suggested here, even in the slightest degree, that there was a thought in his mind when he accepted it that he was in duty bound to show or that he would show favors to anybody by reason of that gift, then there might be some slight basis for that which is here charged against him; but there is neither allegation nor proof of that; and in the absence of allegation and proof, you certainly can not say that an upright judge, admitted by the managers to be such, is to be charged with crime upon suspicion under circumstances such as I have thus stated to you.

I pass, Senators, from that to the twelfth article, the last that I shall be called upon to consider. That article charges that Judge Archbald committed a misdemeanor, because he appointed J. Butler Woodward jury commissioner of the middle district of Pennsylvania, Woodward at that time being a railroad lawyer.

I confess, in view of what has occurred in this trial, that I am left in some doubt as to exactly what the managers do mean by that charge. When I offered in evidence the list of jury commissioners in all of the judicial districts of this country, Mr. Manager CLAYTON arose and objected to that list, because, as he said, the complaint against Judge Archbald was not that he appointed a lawyer as jury commissioner, but that he appointed a railroad lawyer. But when the case was being argued yesterday Mr. Manager STERLING said that the complaint was not that Judge Archbald appointed a railroad lawyer as jury commissioner, though that is what is charged in the article itself, but that he appointed somebody as jury commissioner who was especially engaged in trying one particular class of cases before the court of which he was jury commissioner. You, of course, can not reconcile those statements, but the irreconcilability becomes a matter of considerable indifference when it is found, as the fact is, that Judge Archbald did not even know at the time of the appointment that Mr. Woodward was a railroad lawyer, and when it appears, not only from Mr. Woodward's testimony at this bar, but from the certificate of the clerk of the middle district of Pennsylvania, that during the 10 years while Judge Archbald sat upon the bench of the district court there were but three cases of that railroad and its allied coal companies in that court; that in two of those cases Mr. Woodward was not counsel at all; and in the one in which he was counsel it was not tried at all, but, being a technical case, was submitted to a referee by agreement of the parties. It so happens also that in all of the districts of Pennsylvania—the eastern, the middle, and the western districts—the jury commissioners are lawyers.

It is stated in some of the letters which were produced here and finally offered in evidence that it is not shown that they were railroad lawyers. Of course it is not shown that they were railroad lawyers, but neither is it shown that they were not railroad lawyers. The utmost to which the letters go was the statement made that they were not regularly employed by railroad companies.

Now, I want to know what Judge Archbald's duty was when he came to appoint the jury commissioner. We have an act of Congress that stipulates that duty. That act of Congress provides that he shall be "a citizen of good standing, residing in the district," and "a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that of the clerk of the court."

Was Mr. Woodward that? Everybody admits that he was. Was he of a different political party from the clerk? No one questions that. He was a Democrat, as his father and his grandfather had been before him, and, if I may again follow the bad example of the managers in expressing my own knowledge and belief, his is one of the best-known Democratic families that Pennsylvania ever had or ever will have. He is a man of as high character as ever sat in any tribunal, I care not where the tribunal is. I ask the Senate whether or not Judge Archbald is to be complained of because Congress has not put into the law another requirement in relation to jury commissioners, and whether he is to be complained of because he strictly follows everything that Congress requires, especially in the light of the fact that there is no complaint whatsoever of any wrongdoing at any time by Mr. Woodward? On the contrary, we find Mr. Manager STERLING, in his argument before you yesterday, saying this:

> Aye, gentlemen, do you ask the question, Would you remove Judge Archbald for appointing Woodward jury commissioner when it is not proven here that Woodward ever exercised his power wrongfully? Do you say now, honor bright, would you remove him from office for that? No; I would not if it stood alone, but it is a part of the system; it goes to make up the system; it is an incident in the line of misconduct which has been carried on by Judge Archbald.

Yet in the article which we are now considering there is no suggestion of a system of wrongdoing; and in the thirteenth article, which was the dragnet to draw everything else in, there is no suggestion of a system, so far as the jury commissioner or anything appertaining to that office is concerned. Unless Senators are going to violate their oath of office, they can not possibly under this article convict Judge Archbald, because there has been disproven everything which is alleged in the article, and admittedly none of those allegations are true.

It was said by Mr. Manager STERLING in his argument that the portion of the Constitution relating to impeachment was on trial in this case. I do not know, I never can know, how that can possibly make any difference to men sitting as judges. If you are to decide this case according to the known law of the land, what odds does it make whether that portion of the Constitution relating to impeachment is on trial or not? I think with him that it is on trial; but that which is on trial is the determination of the question whether Senators, who ordinarily sit in a legislative or an executive capacity, can rise to the office of judge and judicially decide the questions which are before them, or whether they are to be moved by appeals to passion and prejudice; whether there is to be invoked here a claim that Judge Archbald has done something not in violation of the law of the land, but in violation of a system of ethics which has not yet found its way into the law of the land; whether a court is to decide a case, not upon the law, which is its only guide, but upon other things which have no place in the law at all.

In that aspect of the matter the portion of the Constitution relating to impeachments is on trial; and if this court is going to say that a man shall be turned out of office, although he has violated no law; although, admittedly, every decision that he rendered has been rendered uprightly; although he has never been partial; although he has been able and industrious and just, then you are turning back the hands of the dial of time until you reach the place where, three or more centuries ago, the House of Lords, at the behest of the House of Commons, turned men out of office simply because they did not agree with them politically.

That is the sense in which the article relating to impeachments is on trial.

I want to know what could Judge Archbald do if these articles are to be sustained? The ninth article charges him with a crime because he had business dealings with a man who had at some time in the past been a litigant in his court. The second article charges him with a crime because he permitted a note to be presented to a man who was a stockholder in a corporation which was then a litigant in his court. The tenth article charges him with a crime because he accepts a favor from a man who at some time in the future may be a litigant in his court. The past, the present, and the future are all closed to him under those three articles. What is the man to do? Can he not buy a suit of clothes because at some time the man who keeps the clothing store may be a litigant in his court? Can he not order his dinner in a restaurant of a proprietor who at one time in the past had been a litigant in his court? That is the tendency and the necessary result of those articles.

I suggest to you that there never has been a time when a man was ever convicted in any court of impeachment anywhere under such circumstances as those. I had always supposed—I know it is true in my great State—that when we find a judge who has been impartial, whose integrity stands admitted, not even challenged, who is able, who is industrious, who has been all of a man—when we find such a man occupying a judicial position we want more of him. For such a man we have encomiums, not blame. However great the mistakes he has made, to his virtues we can be very kind, and to his faults we can certainly be a little blind.

It is highly probable that the case you are now called upon to decide would never have been before you but for the unrest of the times. I mean the political unrest of the times. I am not complaining of that unrest. Make no mistake about that. I am a part of it. I believe the unrest of the times ever leads to higher things. But the unrest of the times does not necessitate the carrying back of this court to the days of the Roman arena, when, because the populace cried out for a victim, the thumbs were turned down. The unrest of the times does not carry back this court to the time of the Savior, when, though Pilate found no fault in Him, because the populace cried "Crucify Him!" "Crucify Him!" He was sent to His death.

That is not what the unrest of the times does. The unrest of the times lops off a wrong here and a wrong there and a wrong yonder, and leads the people up to the point where when they look back, despite all the errors in the intervening steps, they can say, "We have moved up a step higher in these intervening years," or months or days, and ofttimes hours. But it asks no victim at any man's hands, and least of all does it ask a victim from a body of men who are acting as judges. What would be said of any other court than this if, yielding to passion or prejudice or innuendo or anything of that kind, they condemned any man on evidence such as is presented here? And it is in no way to the honor of this court that you are asked to do a thing that none of these managers, I venture to assert, would ask of any other court in this land.

It has been only a very few days since we heard the Christmas chimes ringing "Peace on earth, good will to men." It requires very little imagination in this Chamber at this moment to still hear those chimes ringing. But is there any peace on earth, can there be any peace on earth, to Judge Archbald, can he feel good will to any man if from evidence like that which has been presented here he is to be branded as a criminal and thus sent out into this world? I can not believe that those bells have chimed good will to men in vain. I can not believe that in the highest court which this land knows—in the Senate of the United States sitting as a court for the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald—they will so far forget all the rules of law, all the rules of justice, so far ignore all the well-known laws of the land, as to say that a man who has admittedly violated none of those laws shall be punished because he blundered, I care not how much he blundered.

Over in the State where I come from there are regrets everywhere within its borders that Judge Archbald ever went on the Commerce Court bench. There never has been a day in my time since I have been at the bar that we would not gladly have him in any of our courts, and we would gladly have him to-day. Do you suppose that if he could have at your hands what every other person charged with crime gets in every other court in this land, a trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage, there ever could be a conviction? Do you suppose that in Scranton, where he has been known for fifty-odd years now, you could find 12 men to convict him? If you do, you suppose wrongly. You could not garner them—with all the hate and with all the spite and with all the mistakes that W. P. Boland has shown in this case—out of the middle district of Pennsylvania. No; not five of them. You would have greater trouble than the prophets to save the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah from the hand of the Lord. But because he can not be tried, in the nature of things, before an impartial jury of his vicinage, does that furnish any reason why the character evidence, the necessity for which grows out of that impossibility, should not be given all the weight that would be given to it by the vicinage itself if he could be tried there?

In the early days when a man was put upon trial for crime his neighbors sat as his triers. They knew whether he was likely to commit a crime; they knew whether his accuser was likely to be a truthful man, a biased man, or a lying man, and they judged the case accordingly. Judge Archbald is deprived of that in the nature of things. But he has brought before you character evidence of so great a height that no man could ever hope to attain to a higher one.

There has been upon this stand testifying before you the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, who has known Judge Archbald for thirty-odd years. There has testified from that stand before you the presiding judge of the superior court, who has known Judge Archbald equally long. There has testified before you the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals, with whom Judge Archbald sat at times and who at other times passed on Judge Archbald's rulings in the district court. And they all told you that Judge Archbald's character is of the highest. There are three men than whom there are no better living in the whole State of Pennsylvania, and those men come here and tell you that in their judgment Judge Archbald is incapable of crime. Incapable of crime! My God, what better can be said in any tribunal or any court. Incapable of crime! And yet you are asked upon suspicion alone to convict him as a criminal and turn him out of the office which for 28 long years he has graced, and in which no man has said that he has ever done wrong to any one. That is the man you are asked to convict. And you are to convict him under a Constitution which says that except for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" he shall not be displaced from his office. When it is done, if it ever is, I will believe it, but there rests not in the power of men sufficient to convince me that this Senate will ever do such a thing, for it seems to me that it would not only be a disgrace to the Senate, but it would be a disgrace to our land, which has ever endeavored to foster and to sustain judges who are of high judicial integrity and impartiality, and who are admitted to be so before those who are asked to condemn them.

ARGUMENT OF MR. WORTHINGTON OF COUNSEL FOR RESPONDENT.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President and Senators, the questions of law which are raised in this case and to which I propose in the first place to address myself have assumed an importance greater than we could have anticipated and greater than any which have heretofore arisen in any impeachment trial before this body.

It has been insisted here in the arguments which have been made by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives—not once, not twice, but nearly a dozen times—that the question of Judge Archbald's guilt or innocence is to be determined by what you individually consider to be an offense which justifies his removal from office; not that he has been brought here charged with anything of that kind; but having been brought here charged with certain specific offenses for which he and his counsel have prepared themselves and have summoned their witnesses, he is now to be disgraced and forever branded as a criminal because you may find that he is not fit to be a judge.

I might humbly suggest that if there is ever to be presented to this great body the question whether or not you have the right to impeach an officer of the United States and remove him from his office because you think that on general principles he is not fit to hold his office there might be presented an article of impeachment which would charge that that was the case and that he and his counsel might be prepared to meet it. But instead of that we have him charged with a certain number of specific acts, and when he comes here to meet those and the evidence is closed and the verdict is about to be reached, then we are told for the first time that you individually—each for himself—are to decide whether upon what you have heard here in evidence you think that on general principles he ought to be ejected from his office.

I have not overstated in the slightest degree the proposition that is presented. I need not dwell upon the importance of it, because, if it be so, then not merely Judge Archbald, not merely all the district and circuit judges of the United States and the Justices of the Supreme Court who sit in this building, but the President of the United States and every civil officer of the Government holds his position by the same tenure.

I may say I think it is a very serious question whether you do not yourselves hold your offices by the same frail right. It never yet has been determined whether or not a Senator of the United States is a civil officer of the Government within the meaning of the impeachment clauses of the Constitution. The question was raised in the Blount case, but as he had ceased to be a Senator at the time of his impeachment, it could not then be decided.

But the same Constitution which speaks of the impeachment of civil officers of the Government says that one of the penalties which you may inflict when you impeach an officer is that he never thereafter shall hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. And if you be not officers of the Government of the United States—if the position which you hold be not that of an officer under the Government of the United States—then you can here impeach an officer and remove him from office and provide that he never shall hold any civil office under the Government of the United States, and yet he can be elected to the Senate and sit with you, although he would not legally be fit to hold the office of justice of the peace in the District of Columbia or that of a postmaster at any place in the United States.

So, I think it is a question—certainly it may be a question—whether the Members of the House of Representatives, as well as the Members of this body, hold their office by the privilege of the individuals who happen to compose the Senate at any time and who for any reason may think it a proper thing to remove a person from his office.

That being so, I think it is well to group together the provisions of the Constitution on this subject. I know how wide a range this argument has taken, and how wide a range it has taken when similar questions have arisen, and I may have to follow briefly the lines discussed in previous cases. But to my mind it is utterly unnecessary to go beyond a single clause of the Constitution of the United States to determine that question, and that is the one which has been so often read in your hearing, which says that civil officers of the United States may be impeached for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

If this discussion had originated now for the first time and if this were the first time that that sentence was heard by the members of this body, I should like to know whether there is one of you to whose mind it would ever have occurred for a moment that it meant anything except an offense punishable in a court of justice. I do not like the word "indictability," because a great many crimes are punished by information and not upon indictment. When I use that term I mean it in the sense of punishment in any way in a criminal court.

Now my friend Mr. Manager STERLING when he read certain provisions of the Constitution at the outset of his argument said those were all that were necessary to be considered in this matter. He omitted two of them which to my mind are at least as important as any others and which of themselves should be decisive if the one I have cited does not conclude the question.

Section 2, Article III, paragraph 3, says:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

"Trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment."

Again the fifth amendment to the Constitution says:

Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.

Would anybody suggest that if Judge Archbald should be acquitted by you, the House of Representatives might legally again find articles of impeachment against him for the same offense? Would anybody suppose that if he had not chosen to take the witness stand in his own behalf the managers could have dragged him there and compelled him to testify?

I may mention in passing that this is the first time in the history of the United States when a respondent in an impeachment case ever has taken the stand in his own behalf.

And so the sixth amendment says:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Where is the man in this United States of America who would suggest that Judge Archbald could be required to answer without being informed of what is the accusation against him? Where is the man who would suggest that it is not necessary to confront him with the witnesses against him? Where is the man who would say he is not entitled to have subpœnas issued to bring his witnesses here to testify for him? Where is the person who will say that you could turn his counsel out of this Chamber and say he has to defend himself? Why? Because it is a criminal prosecution, and if it be not a criminal prosecution then it is nothing known to the laws of this land.

Now, it so happened that in the formation of this Constitution of ours this happened. I am reading, for convenience, from first Foster on the Constitution, page 508. It is simply a quotation from the proceedings in the Constitutional Convention:

Col. MASON. Why is the provision restrained to treason and bribery only? Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason, as above defined. As bills of attainder, which have saved the British constitution, are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend the power of impeachments. He moved to add, after "bribery," "or maladministration." Mr. Gerry seconded him.

Mr. MADISON. So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during pleasure of the Senate.

So they struck it out and put in, instead of the vague term "maladministration," the term "other high crimes and misdemeanors," and now at the end of 125 years after that was done in that convention the managers of the House of Representatives come here and tell you that the provision as it stands means that Judge Archbald shall be turned out of his high office at the pleasure of the Senate. Nay, it is not at the pleasure of the Senate. It is more than that; it is at the pleasure of the individual Senators. You do not, under their construction of this language, have to decide anything as a Senate, but you may have a vote of the Senate of "guilty" or "not guilty," and if anybody thinks the judge is not sufficiently good looking to be upon the bench he may vote against him for that reason. To use the language of one of the managers—on what ground I know not—if he has a large and expensive family you may vote against him for that reason.

As to these articles of impeachment, there may not be 10 votes in favor of turning him out as to any one, but on the whole Senators may combine their votes and turn him out!

And remember also, Senators, that when this Constitution was created there was the well-known form of removing all civil officers—judges and others—by what was called the address. That was referred to by my brother Simpson. It became the law of England in 1701. By it, without making any charges which would involve disgrace upon the part of an individual officer, if it was thought a good thing to turn him out, the Houses of Parliament could request the King to remove him. That provision was carefully left out of the Constitution of the United States, so that no such power exists.

Now, under the constitutions of the different States it is otherwise. They have seen that an impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors does not allow an officer to be turned out of his office simply because it is thought on the whole he had better be turned out—that he is not a fit man to be in office. The States have almost universally provided for removal by address.

I happen to have in my hand a copy of an address delivered before a bar association in Oklahoma by a Member of this body, Mr. Senator OWEN, in which he has collated the laws of the different States on that subject; and it shows that nearly all of them have the provision for removal by address.

In an article written by the same distinguished Senator, published in the Yale Law Journal for June, 1912, he expresses the idea which is in my mind and which I have undertaken to state here.

Impeachment—

He says—

is wholly inadequate for practical purposes. It can only be invoked for the most serious crimes.

In another place in the article he says:

Impeachment is too severe a remedy in certain cases and is impracticable for offenses justifying removal but not deserving impeachment, which latter power should only be invoked for actual personal corruption or serious criminal conduct.

Nobody could better have expressed our idea as to what is the meaning of the Constitution than Senator Owen has done in that phrase.

But let me go on with another provision of the Constitution. Article I, section 3, paragraph 7, provides:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

With what assurance can the learned managers stand before the Senate and say, in view of that provision, that a man may be removed from an office for that for which he could not be prosecuted in a criminal court?

Finally, and most important of all, is this provision:

Section 2 of Article II of the Constitution provides—

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

A man may commit the most diabolical murder, commit burglary, or rob the United States Treasury of a million dollars or commit any other enormous offense which violates the laws of the United States, and the President of the United States can make his record as white as snow by saying: "I pardon him"; but if you convict Judge Archbald of high crimes and misdemeanors, as you must if you convict him at all, because of these things he has done which it is said are improper, you have put him in a position where he never can escape from the penalty of his action. Nobody can relieve him. He must carry it with him all his life. It will make for him a winding sheet to take with him into his coffin. It will stand here as a record against his children and their descendants as long as this Government of ours shall endure.

The managers say that this is not a criminal matter; that it is merely a little civil proceeding by which to get rid of an officer who you think ought not longer to occupy the position. That applies not to Judge Archbald alone but to every civil officer of the Government. If the President of the United States should happen to do something which you may consider to be an impropriety, there is no means of removing anybody except by impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and you can remove the President of the United States and put him out of office on such futile and uncertain grounds.

I have referred to the language of the Constitution and to what happened when it was formed. Is is said, however, you must be governed by the English view of this subject; that while our fathers had determined that they would get rid of the tyranny of the Parliament and the King when they framed this Constitution of ours, we are to go back and see how they exercised their tyranny and act accordingly in enforcing our Constitution. I say that you are not at liberty to accept the English precedents. It so happens that I have in support of that contention a notable and learned opinion delivered in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sitting in general term about 30 years ago.

You all remember that when President Garfield was murdered by Charles J. Guiteau the wound was inflicted here in the District of Columbia, and the President was taken to the State of New Jersey, where he died. Guiteau was indicted here for the crime of murder, and under the Constitution of the United States Guiteau was entitled to be tried where his crime was committed. The English precedents were that a man can not be tried for murder in any county in England unless his victim had died in that county. Numerous decisions of the English courts to that effect were thrown upon the table and shown to the judge by Guiteau's counsel. Mr. Justice James, a most able judge, one of the ablest who ever sat in this District, delivered that opinion, an extract from which I shall here ask to have incorporated into my remarks, in which he said that we are to determine the meaning of the phrases in our Constitution according to our understanding of the Constitution and that you can not look to alien laws to see what our forefathers meant in framing a government for ourselves. I will not undertake to dwell on that or to read it here, but I shall insert it at this place in my argument.

We turn, now, to the peculiar and higher ground on which we conceive this question should stand, and to considerations to which as a court of the United States, exercising the judicial power of the United States, we are required to give special attention. However proper it may be that the courts of the States where the common law exists should treat the question of jurisdiction from the standpoint of that law, that question must be treated by the courts of the United States, wherever a fort or magazine or an arsenal or a district of country is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Government, from the standpoint of Federal authority and with reference to the relation of the crime to the sovereignty of the United States.

We take it to be a fundamental rule of construction that an independent and sovereign government is always to be understood, when it makes laws for its own people, to speak without any reference to the law of another people or Government, unless those laws themselves contain plain proof of a contrary intention, and that, when it thus appears that something is actually borrowed and embodied therein from the laws of another people, the extent of that adoption is to be strictly construed and not enlarged by implication. So far as its laws can be understood only by reference to foreign law, that reference is authorized by the lawmaker, because it is necessary; but so far as its commands may be understood as original terms, and without such reference, they must be construed independently. It is only when understood to be, to this extent, the original expression of its own will that its words can communicate to its own people the whole and self-sufficient force of that will. To assume, without plain necessity, that it utters the intention of an alien law, is to ignore to just that extent its absolute independence of existence and action and will.

By the argument which is made here by the managers as to the proper way to construe our Constitution by referring to English precedents and customs as they stood when our Constitution was formed, Charles J. Guiteau would have gone unwhipped of justice, for he could not have been punished either in the District of Columbia or the State of New Jersey, for such was the state of English decisions, strange as it may seem, at the time we separated from the mother country.

But what of it? I say that if we go back to English precedents you will find the situation to be precisely the same as we claim it is here under the plain language of our Constitution. You may not go back to the days when it was forbidden for a man on trial before the House of Lords to have counsel in his defense, when he was not permitted to testify; and when after he had been convicted he was not merely to be removed from office, but if the House of Lords chose he could be taken to the block and he could be disembowled and his bowels held before his face before he was dead. I do not understand that the managers expect us to go back to those days to find precedents to govern your decision.

And if you will take the later cases you will find that the doctrine is laid down exactly as we are seeking to lay it down here, that if you want to punish a civil officer for a crime against the law you may impeach him, but for anything else you must seek the remedy by address. Even as far back as 1724, in the case of the Earl of Macclesfield, reported in Howell's State Trials, you will find the whole contention from the beginning to the end in that case was whether the things which the Earl of Macclesfield was charged with doing were crimes. The managers labored, and successfully labored, to show that what he was charged with doing was an offense at the common law and was an offense under certain statutes which they cited.

The case of Warren Hastings, of course, must be adverted to in this connection. I have seen it claimed by some that what he was charged with did not amount to crimes. In other equally able and important statements by learned writers it has been shown that his alleged offenses clearly did amount to crimes. But what matters it? I do not understand, as the managers seem to, that when you find that a person has been charged in a court with a certain offense that that is a decision that that thing is a criminal offense. I do not understand that merely because a man has been charged in articles of impeachment with doing certain things that alone determines that those things are impeachable offenses. You look to the action of the court, and when you find a case in the later days in England, in the last century before we separated from her, or in the United States, where a man was charged in an article of impeachment with doing something that was not a crime against positive law and was convicted, then you will have a precedent which you can cite here against us; but you can find no such. In the case of Warren Hastings, which, as we all know, dragged along, being heard from time to time for seven years, so long that a great many of the members had gone out of the House or had not heard enough of the evidence to justify them in voting, out of the large body of the House of Lords only 29 members voted, and the worst vote against Mr. Hastings on any article was 6 for conviction and 23 not guilty. So if that case decides anything it decides that what he was charged with was not a crime.

But most important of all is the case of Lord Melville, in 29 Howell's State Trials, page 1417, the last impeachment trial in England, which occurred in 1806. In that case Lord Melville had been the treasurer of the navy, or he had been in such a position that he handled the public funds belonging to the navy of Great Britain, and some alleged misuse of those moneys formed the basis of the charge against him in the several articles of the impeachment. It appeared that he had taken the money out of the treasury and deposited it in some private place. His claim was that he did that merely for convenience, not with the intent of converting the money to his own use. The question was, Did that amount to a criminal offense? The House of Lords referred that question to the law Lords, who gave their opinion, as you will find at the page I have referred to, saying that the things charged did not constitute indictable offenses, and thereupon Lord Melville was promptly acquitted.

Now, Senators, what has taken place in this country in this regard is no less conclusive. The case of Senator Blount in 1798 is referred to. You can not tell anything about what the judgment of the court in that case would have been upon the merits, because he had been expelled from the Senate; and when the articles of impeachment were presented he made no reply to the merits at all, but counsel said, "You can not impeach a Senator, and, besides, he is out of office." Upon that double plea the Senate voted—14 to 11—that it set forth a good defense, and there were no further proceedings in the case.

Then came the case of John Pickering, by which one of the learned managers—Mr. Manager HOWLAND—this morning had some pleasantries at my expense, in which there were three articles of impeachment, two charging him in the performance of his duties upon the bench in a prize case involving the question of the custody of a certain vessel of deliberately, by his orders in the court, violating acts of Congress prescribing his duties as a judge. Of course, that was a criminal offense. But the thing which was in the mind of Mr. Manager HOWLAND is this: He said that in the opening statement I made here I said intoxication was a crime. I said nothing of the kind. If my friend will turn to the opening statement he will find that he is greatly mistaken. I said that when a man becomes intoxicated in a public place and acts in a disorderly manner it is a well-known crime everywhere in the United States and in every civilized country, I suppose, on the globe. The charge was first as a preamble that Judge Pickering was in the habit of getting intoxicated, and then that he had gone upon the bench in a drunken and intoxicated condition and deported himself in an unseemly manner and had there, in open court, used the name of the Divine Being profanely.

You may go down to our police court or any police court in the land and you will find a large portion of the cases are for drunk and disorderly conduct. Of course, that would not ordinarily be considered an indictable offense, or that even a Federal judge could be turned out of office if once in a while he happened to get on a slight spree. Yet it is a high misdemeanor within the very terms of the provision of the Constitution when a judge goes into court in a drunken condition and there uses the name of God in vain or otherwise conducts himself in an indecent manner. I beg the pardon of the Chair for even supposing such an illustration; but what would you say if a Senator who happened to be presiding in this body would come here, and when the proceedings are opened take his seat in the Presiding Officer's chair, drunk, unable to conduct himself in a seemly manner, and swear and curse in the face of the public here? Would anybody say that that is not an offense for which he might be taken down to the police court and punished?

Then comes the case of Samuel Chase as to which one of the learned managers has followed what is said in the encyclopedia.

It is the first time in a case of this kind that anyone has asked the Senate to be governed by an encyclopedia or a dictionary. In the American and English Encyclopedia it is said that in one of these impeachment cases the counsel for the respondent first raised the defense that the offense must be an indictable one, but abandoned it. That reference could only be to the case of Judge Chase. I have all that was said by the counsel for Judge Chase in that trial upon that subject, every word of it from beginning to end, and I shall ask to have the privilege of incorporating that at this point in my remarks, and will not take up your time with reading it.

Mr. Hopkinson:

Misdemeanor is a legal and technical term, well understood and defined in law; and in the construction of a legal instrument we must give to words the legal signification; a misdemeanor, or a crime, for in their just and proper acceptation they are synonymous terms, is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it. By this test let the conduct of the respondent be tried, and by it let him stand justified or condemned. * * * We have read, sir, in our younger days, and read with horror, of the Roman emperor who placed his edicts so high in the air that the keenest eye could not decipher them, and yet severely punished any breach of them. But the power claimed by the House of Representatives to make anything criminal at their pleasure, at any period after its occurrence, is ten thousand times more dangerous, more tyrannical, more subversive of all liberty and safety. (2 Chase's Trial, 13, 17.)

Luther Martin (who was a member of the convention of 1787 which framed our Constitution):

I shall now proceed in the inquiry, For what can the President, Vice President, or other civil officers, and consequently for what can a judge be impeached? And I shall contend that it must be for an indictable offense. The words of the Constitution are that "they shall be liable to impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." There can be no doubt but that treason and bribery are indictable offenses. We have only to inquire, then, what is meant by "high crimes and misdemeanors." What is the true meaning of the word "crime"? It is breach of some law which renders the person who violates it liable to punishment. There can be no crime committed where no such law is violated. * * * Nay, sir, I am ready to go further and say there may be instances of very high crimes and misdemeanors for which an officer ought not to be impeached and removed from office; the crimes ought to be such as relate to his office or which tend to cover the person who committed them with turpitude and infamy; such as to show there can be no dependence on that integrity and honor which will secure the performance of his official duties. (Ibid., 137, 139.)

Mr. Harper:

If the conviction of a judge on impeachment be not to depend on his guilt or innocence of some crime alleged against him, but on some reasons of state, policy, or expediency, which may be thought by the House of Representatives and two-thirds of the Senate to require his removal, I ask why the solemn mockery of articles alleging high crimes and misdemeanors, of a court regularly formed, of a judicial oath administered to the members, of the private examination of witnesses, and of a trial conducted in all the usual forms? Why not settle this question of expediency, as all other questions of expediency are settled, by reference to general political considerations, and in the usual mode of political discussion? No, Mr. President, this principle of the honorable managers, so novel and so alarming; this desperate expedient, resorted to as the last and only prop of a case, which the honorable gentlemen feel to be unsupported by law or evidence; this forlorn hope of the prosecution, pressed into its service after it was found that no offense against any law of the land could be proved, will not, can not avail. Everything by which we are surrounded informs us that we are in a court of law. Everything that we have been for three weeks employed in doing reminds us that we are engaged not in a mere inquiry into the fitness of an officer for the place which he holds, but in the trial of a criminal case on legal principles. And this great truth, so important to the liberties and happiness of this country, is fully established by the decisions of this honorable court in this case on questions of evidence; decisions by which this court has solemnly declared that it holds itself bound to those principles of law which govern tribunals in ordinary cases.

These decisions we accepted as a pledge and now rely on as an assurance that this cause will be determined on no newly discovered notions of political expediency, or state policy, but on the well-settled and well-known principles of law (pp. 206, 207, bracketed). * * * Thus we find that even in England, where the power of impeachment is subject to no expressed constitutional restriction and where abuses of that power for the purpose of party persecution and state policy have sometimes been committed and more frequently attempted, an impeachment has never been considered as a mere inquest of office, but always as a criminal prosecution, differing not in essentials from those which are carried on before the ordinary tribunals of justice and subject to the same rules of evidence and the same legal notions concerning crimes and punishments. * * * What, Mr. President, are offenses in the language of the Constitution and the laws? For a definition of the term "offense," in a constitutional sense, we must consult our law books and not the caprice or the varying opinions of popular leaders or popular assemblies. Those books tell us that the word "offense" means some violation of law. Whence it evidently follows that no officer of Government can be impeached unless he have committed some violation of the law, either statute or common. It is not necessary for me to contend that this offense must be an indictable offense.

I might safely admit the contrary, though I do not admit it; and there are reasons which appear to me unanswerable in favor of the opinion that no offense is impeachable unless it be also the proper subject of an indictment. But it is not necessary to go so far; and I can suppose cases where a judge ought to be impeached for acts which I am not prepared to declare indictable. Suppose, for instance, that a judge should constantly omit to hold court; or should habitually attend so short a time each day as to render it impossible to dispatch the business. It might be doubted whether an indictment would lie for those acts of omission, although I am inclined to think that it would. But I have no hesitation in saying that the judge in such a case ought to be impeached. And this comes within the principle for which I contend; for these acts of culpable omission are a plain and direct violation of the law, which commands him to hold courts a reasonable time for the dispatch of business; and of his oath which binds him to discharge faithfully and diligently the duties of his office. The honorable gentleman who opened the case on the part of the prosecution cited the case of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the part of a judge as an instance of an offense not indictable, and yet punishable by impeachment. But I deny this position. Habitual drunkenness in a judge and profane swearing in any person are indictable offenses, and if they were not, still they are violations of the law. I do not mean to say that there is a statute against drunkenness or profane swearing; but they are offenses against good morals, and as such are forbidden by the common law.

They are offenses in the sight of God and man, definite in their nature, capable of precise proof and of a clear defense. The honorable managers have cited a case decided in this court as an authority to prove that a man may be convicted on impeachment without having committed an offense. I mean the case of Judge Pickering. But that case does not support the position. The defendant there was charged with habitual drunkenness and gross misbehavior in court arising from this drunkenness. The defense set up was that the defendant was insane and that the instances adduced of intoxication and improper behavior proceeded from his insanity. On this point there was a contrariety of evidence. It is not for me to inquire on which side the truth lay. But the court, by finding the defendant guilty, gave their sanction to the charge that his insanity proceeded from habitual drunkenness. This case, therefore, proves nothing further than that habitual drunkenness is an impeachable offense. * * * The great principle for which we contend and which is so strongly supported by the clause of the Constitution already cited, that an impeachment is a criminal prosecution and can not be maintained without the proof of some offense against the laws, pervades all the other provinces of the Constitution on the subject of impeachment. * * *

In every light, therefore, in which this great principle can be viewed, whether as a well-established doctrine of the Constitution, as the bulwark of personal safety and judicial independence, as a shield for the characters of those whose lot it may be to sit on a trial of impeachment; or as a solace to them under the necessity of pronouncing a fellow citizen guilty, it equally claims—and I can not doubt that it will receive—the sanction of this honorable court, by whose decision it will, I trust, be established, so far as hereafter to be brought into question, that an impeachment is not a mere inquiry—in the nature of an inquest of office, whether an officer be qualified for his place or whether some reason of policy or expediency may not demand his removal—but a criminal prosecution, for supporting which the proof of some willful violation of a known law of the land is to be indispensably required. * * *

And will this honorable body, sitting not in a legislative but a judicial capacity, be called on to make a law, and to make it for a particular case which has already occurred? What, sir, is the great definition between legislative and judicial functions? Is it not that the former is to make the law for future cases, and that the latter is to declare it as to cases which have already happened? Is it not one of the fundamental principles of our Constitution and an essential ingredient of free government that the legislative and judicial powers shall be kept distinct and separate? That the power of making a general law for future cases shall never be blended in the same hand with that of declaring and applying it to particular and present cases? Does not the union of these two powers in the same hands constitute the worst of despotism? What, sir, is the peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of despotism? It consists in this, sir: That a man may be punished for an act which when he did it was not forbidden by law. While, on the other hand, it is the essence of freedom that no act can be treated as a crime unless there were a precise law forbidding it at the time when it was done. (2 Chase's Trial, 251, 253, 254, 257, 264.)

In the answer which the counsel for Judge Chase prepared they specifically set up the defense that what he was charged with was not an indictable offense, and all through the discussion of the case his counsel over and over insisted upon that point. Mr. Harper, whose language was used by Mr. HOWLAND as indicating the opposite, closed the arguments that were made on that subject in behalf of Judge Chase with the statement that he could not be convicted unless he had violated a known and positive law of the land. What was done with Judge Chase? He was acquitted, a majority of the Senators voting for his acquittal.

Now, shall we say that when you take a man into a court of impeachment and a majority of the judges acquit him of the charge, that that is a decision by the court, that what he was charged with was an impeachable offense?

In the case of Peck, in which there was but a single article of impeachment, what he had done was to take and throw a lawyer into jail and disbar him for 18 months because the lawyer had presumed to criticize his opinion in a case in which the lawyer was counsel for the losing party. He sent him to jail for 24 hours, long enough I take it for a man of the standing of Mr. Lawless to disgrace him. He sent him to jail for 24 hours and suspended him from practice because he presumed to criticize the judge's opinion out of court. If it be not a criminal offense for a judge in the performance of his judicial functions without law or right to send a man to jail, then I do not know what you might consider a criminal offense.

But what was the defense that was made for Judge Peck? Mr. Wirt was his principal counsel and spoke three days in his behalf. You will find from the beginning to the end of his argument he contended that because Judge Peck believed he had a right to punish in that way for contempt he should not be convicted. As was suggested by my friend, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Buchanan, afterwards President of the United States, who was the chairman of the managers of the impeachment in that case, did what I might humbly suggest to the learned chairman of the managers in this case. When Judge Peck was acquitted on the ground that if he did not have the right to punish Lawless in that way for contempt, he honestly believed he had that right and should not be impeached merely for committing an error, Mr. Buchanan went back to the House of Representatives, and the next day started legislation which resulted in what we have had upon our statute books ever since, that a judge of a Federal court shall not punish in a summary way for contempt for an offense committed out of the presence of the court.

I will not stop to say anything about the case of Judge Humphries. Judge Humphries made no defense, and of course nothing could be concluded where there was no adverse party. He was charged with joining the Confederacy and abandoning his court. It is needless to say anything more on that subject.

Now, I want to come to what it seems to me is the case which ought to be an end of this discussion in the Senate of the United States—the case of Andrew Johnson. He became President in the spring of 1865, after the assassination of Mr. Lincoln and almost immediately, as we all know, became involved in a war with Congress. For two long years and more there was a very unfortunate state of affairs here in which he was charging that Congress was an illegal body hanging on the verge of the Government, to use his words in a speech he made in Cleveland, Ohio, because it did not admit to membership in the House and Senate the representatives of the 10 States which had gone out in 1860 and 1861. Congress was passing laws over his veto over and over again, and there was a state of feeling between Congress on the one hand and the President on the other which never existed in this country before and, let us hope, will never exist again.

In that state of affairs the Judiciary Committee of the House had before it a resolution sent to it by the House directing it to inquire whether Andrew Johnson had committed offenses for which he should be impeached. Mr. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, then a Member of the House, was chairman of that committee, and on behalf of five of the nine members he made a report recommending impeachment. Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, one of the greatest lawyers who ever sat in that body, made a report concurred in by the other three members in which he opposed impeachment and recommended that the resolution favoring impeachment which the majority had reported should not be adopted, because, and only because, the offenses which were charged were not indictable under any law of the United States. He made that report which reviewed the whole subject, and it might perhaps be needless for me to say a word here on this question except to read it. It is already printed in our brief and will be found at the end of the first volume of the printed record in this case at pages 1074 to 1084.

The history of impeachment trials in England from the beginning with the origin of our Constitution and what took place in the constitutional convention and subsequent developments down to 1867 were all set forth at great length and with great ability.

In the House of Representatives, in which there was a three-fourths vote in favor of vetoing the bills of the President, a House in which three-fourths of the Members were violently opposed to the President, when those two reports came before it, Mr. Wilson moved to lay the resolution for impeachment on the table. That motion was carried by nearly a two-thirds vote. The majority had set forth 26 different things which they said the President had done for which he ought to be impeached, mostly what might be called political offenses, and the House determined that they would not favor the impeachment, much as they desired to get rid of the President, because he had not done anything which was indictable and therefore could not be impeached.

Some months before, in the spring of 1867, Congress as one of the things which it had done which enraged Johnson, had passed a tenure-of-office bill, long since repealed, by which they undertook to make it impossible for the President to remove officers without the consent of the Senate. There was a special provision in that bill, that while the President when the Senate was not in session might remove an officer, yet when the Senate came back in December, if it did not confirm that action, the removed officer should resume his office and should be allowed to keep it. In that same summer of 1867 President Johnson undertook to remove Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War and to appoint Lorenzo Thomas as Secretary ad interim. Congress was not in session; and he had the right to do that. Under that act, Gen. Grant became Secretary of War ad interim; but when Congress met the Senate refused to confirm the President's action, and Mr. Stanton immediately retook possession of the War Department. On the 21st day of February following, in defiance of the penal provision of the tenure-of-office act, President Johnson undertook to remove Mr. Stanton, and sent Lorenzo Thomas over to Stanton's office with a letter directing Stanton to surrender possession to Thomas. Stanton, as we all remember, refused to do it. The matter came before the House of Representatives, and the House at once impeached Mr. Johnson. Mr. Wilson, who had made the minority report, of which I spoke, which was adopted by the House, then said, "Now the President has committed an indictable offense; and let us impeach him."

It is true, as Mr. Manager HOWLAND said to-day, that in those articles of impeachment there was one which charged the President with having made certain declarations and speeches about Congress as to which there was a question whether he had committed an indictable offense. When it came to a vote here in the Senate, the Senate voted first upon the last article—article 13—which charged a violation of the tenure of office law, and there was a vote of 35 for convicting and 19 against, one vote less than was necessary in order to convict Mr. Johnson; and so he was acquitted.

The Senate then immediately adjourned for two weeks, in order that those who favored impeachment might consider what they could do. They came together here again on the 26th of May, 1868. What did they do? They voted upon article 2 and upon article 3, both of which charged distinctly a violation of the penal provisions of the tenure of office law. Having the same vote upon those two articles, the Senate then adjourned without day without voting upon the other articles at all.

Now, I say there is a formal adjudication of both Houses of Congress, and in as important a case as ever came before the Senate, that, in order to be impeachable, an offense must be indictable.

I need not remind the Senate of the able men who sat on that side of the Chamber presenting the views of the House and the great lawyers who sat over here presenting the views of the President, or the great men who sat in this Chamber at that time and voted upon one side or the other. It was my good fortune to be present during most of that trial, and I remember well particularly that Senator Sumner, who sat over in that part of the Chamber [indicating] and was one of the most active participants in favor of impeachment, could not conceal his impatience with the slow progress of events. He wanted all sorts of evidence to be let in; he wanted the President removed for political reasons; and he was the most disappointed man, perhaps, in this whole body when the impeachment failed. I have just read an article in the December Century Magazine by one of the two survivors of the Senate of that day, Senator Henderson, who voted against impeachment and who still lives in this city, wherein he states that Senator Sumner came to him not long before he died and said, "Henderson, I want to let you know that I was wrong about that impeachment matter and that you were right. I do not want you to say anything about this until after I am dead, but then I want you to make it known."

There have been two impeachment cases since that time, neither of which, it seems to me, in the slightest degree affects the question we have here. Mr. Belknap was charged with bribery—several clear, distinct, specific acts of receiving money in consideration of having made an appointment to office. No defense was made in his case, except that which finally prevailed, that, because anticipating he would be impeached, he went to President Grant and got the President to accept his resignation. I may have something more to say about that case in another part of this argument, but it has no relation to the subject I am discussing now, because it is clear that he was charged with indictable offenses.

In the Swayne case it is true that the counsel for Judge Swayne in presenting the law of that case used a brief which I understood the managers here to say they disowned. I do not so read anything that took place in that record. They had a brief there, which everybody knows was written by Mr. Hannis Taylor; and who Mr. Hannis Taylor is I need not explain to anybody in this Chamber. In that brief he simply took the position that because Judge Swayne was not charged with having done anything in the performance of his official duties, but that everything he was charged with was something outside of his duties in court, he could not be punished for that reason; and his counsel rested the case upon that proposition. As Judge Swayne was acquitted, I do not see how anybody can contend that the Senate held in that case that what Judge Swayne was charged with constituted an impeachable offense.

I do not recall that any of the managers have referred to this, but it has been referred to in the other cases and may be in the minds of many Members of this body, and I therefore mention it. It has been said, If you are right about that, under what law are you to decide what is an indictable offense? Then it is said that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that there are no common-law offenses against the United States, and that, therefore, when the Constitution was adopted and when the Government went into operation there were no penal laws; that as there was no penal statute passed for more than a year after the Government was started, no officer during that time could be impeached for any offense whatever. Now, I say that that is a fallacy; the whole argument is a fallacy and altogether wrong. The common law is in force in this tribunal except as changed by acts of Congress. When we come to see why it was that the Supreme Court held that there were no common-law offenses in the inferior courts of the United States, we see at once that the application of that decision to impeachment proceedings is entirely without foundation. I read from the first case in which that question was decided, in Hudson v. Goodwin (7 Cranch, p. 32):

> The powers of the General Government are made up of concessions from the several States; whatever is not expressly given to the former, the latter expressly reserve. The judicial power of the United States is a constituent part of those concessions; that power is to be exercised by courts organized for the purpose and brought into existence by an effort of the legislative power of the Union. Of all the courts which the United States may under their general powers constitute, one only, the Supreme Court, possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them, and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer.

So, you see, the Supreme Court merely held that the inferior courts of the United States, which were created by acts of Congress, would take such jurisdiction, and no more, as Congress chose to give them.

It so happened that when Congress created the original criminal court and the other courts in the District of Columbia, they did what might just as well have been done in 1790 as to all the Federal courts. When this District was ceded to the Government and Congress took possession, a law was passed on the 27th of February, 1801, which is still the organic law of the District of Columbia. In that statute they simply said that the laws of the State of Maryland (which included the common law) should remain in force in the District of Columbia until otherwise ordered by Congress.

Congress might have done that for all the Federal courts, but it did not choose to do so. It might do it to-day; but instead of that it has from time to time, as the need appeared for it, passed acts defining criminal offenses.

You perceive at once that this court to which I am speaking is on the same plane in that regard as the Supreme Court of the United States. You are not the creature of any act of Congress. You, like the Supreme Court, are created by the Constitution, and you have the same authority and power to determine what the laws were which existed at the time you were created as the Supreme Court would have to decide what were the laws which govern its proceedings under the provisions of the Constitution, giving it original jurisdiction as to certain classes of cases.

That brings me to another objection which has been made here and which has been often referred to in the textbooks which gentlemen seem to think are of importance here, but which, of course, are only based on the cases, and we have the cases. They say there are many evil acts a judge or other civil officer of the Government might do that are not indictable, and it would be very bad indeed to allow such officer to continue in office, as you would have to do if you decide that he can only be impeached for an indictable offense, this, that, and the other act not being indictable. You find that running all through the discussion of impeachment cases in past times, and especially in the textbooks.

There is an offense known to the common law as misconduct in office, and it reaches, so far as I have been able to discover, almost every one of the illustrations which have been referred to of various acts which it is said would not be indictable offenses, and yet should be impeachable offenses. It is asked, suppose a judge refuses to hold court; suppose he refuses to summon a jury? Well, if he does, he is guilty of misconduct in office. Let me read what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in one simple sentence on that subject. I read from the opinion in the case of South against Maryland, in 18th Howard, page 402:

> It is an undisputed principle of the common law that for a breach of a public duty an officer is punishable by indictment.

Let me give you an instance of what happened in this District, which sufficiently illustrates that subject without going any further. I refer to the case of Tyner against the United States, in 23 Appeals, D. C., 324, a case decided by our Court of Appeals a few years ago. Gen. Tyner had been Assistant Attorney General in charge of the legal work of the Post Office Department. He was indicted, charged with conspiring with a nephew of his to commit an offense against the United States, to wit: The offense of misconduct in office. What was that misconduct? It was his duty, among other things, to investigate charges that were made of the use of the mails for fraudulent purposes, and when he found that there was a case presented which justified action, to go to the Postmaster General and recommend the issuance of a fraud order. We all know, of course, what that means—to stop the use of the mails by fraudulent concerns. The charge was that in a number of cases he had before him evidence that the mails were being used for fraudulent purposes by a number of concerns, which were named in the indictment, which were called investment companies, and that he neglected his duty to go to the Postmaster General and ask for fraud orders in those cases. That indictment was demurred to, and it was claimed on the part of his counsel that that did not constitute an offense under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes. All that Tyner's counsel claimed was that, since there is no such offense as misconduct in office known to the other Federal courts throughout the country, it could not be applied in our local jurisdiction; but the Supreme Court held that, under the common law, the failure of Gen. Tyner, with the evidence before him that the mails were being used for fraudulent purposes by certain named concerns, to go to the Postmaster General and report that and ask for a fraud order was a crime under the common law, the crime known as misconduct in office. So the case went back to trial, and in due time Gen. Tyner was promptly acquitted by the jury. I am not going to take the time to go over the illustrations which have been given here and elsewhere, but if you will go over them you will find that almost without exception they come within that rule of misconduct in office by a public officer.

There is this curious thing about it: It has been suggested in some cases that the law is uncertain in that regard as to whether when a public officer—judge, President, Cabinet officer, or what not—commits an indictable offense against the laws of the United States he can be proceeded against by indictment before he is impeached; and it has been suggested that if he still be in office he must first be impeached. Of course, that makes no difference about the proposition for which we are contending, because the Constitution expressly says that after the officer has been impeached, convicted, and removed from office he shall nevertheless be subject to indictment and trial in the ordinary courts.

As against all that, what do we have suggested here. "Why," says Mr. Manager HOWLAND, "a man who is a civil officer may be impeached whenever the public welfare requires it." If any one of you thinks that the public welfare requires Judge Archbald to be removed, according to this contention you are to vote for his conviction on any particular article you please to select or on all of them, just as you may see fit, although there is no charge here that the public welfare requires him to be removed. And then, says Mr. Manager STERLING, "Each Senator fixes his own standard in that regard;" and, as Mr. Manager WEBB says, "Crimes and misdemeanors have no meaning;" and, as Mr. Manager WEBB said again, "That is, at your pleasure, Senators."

I stated that this was something without precedent, but there was one very bold man who stood in this Chamber some years ago and did the same thing, but he used plainer terms. In the Johnson impeachment trial, when Gen. Benjamin F. Butler was making the opening statement here to the Senate, he announced this doctrine in these words, "Senators, you are a law unto yourselves"; and it was in reply to that proclamation by Gen. Butler, who was bold enough to claim anything anywhere, that Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, one of Mr. Johnson's counsel, uttered the words which Mr. Simpson read from the record in the Johnson case.

Now, I say, instead of that, if there is anything which you find here which Judge Archbald has done which is not indictable and impeachable which you think ought to be indictable and impeachable, do what was done in the Peck case; let the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this day do what the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee of 1831 did, go to the House, and the day after Judge Archbald is acquitted introduce a bill which shall provide that if any Federal judge shall at any time have any business transactions with any person who shall be or shall be likely to be a litigant in his court he shall, let us say, be fined in the sum of a thousand dollars and imprisoned for not less than one year, or both.

If this theory of the managers is to be adopted, what becomes of the principle which is at the foundation of all criminal jurisdiction in every country which pretends to recognize law, and especially so in this country and under our Constitution. If a man is brought into court he is entitled to know with what he is charged, and, as I said a few moments ago, Judge Archbald is not charged with having done anything which is against the public welfare or for which Senators ought to put him out of office on general principles.

But if I do not misunderstand what is intimated here, whether it is expressly said or not, what you are called upon to do by these learned managers is this: You are to say, with respect to article 1, "I do not find that there is anything there which justifies convicting Judge Archbald," and so with the other articles, "yet he has done certain things and under certain conditions which I think render him unfit to be a Federal judge."

Now, I ask you, Senators, if it is intended to ask the Senate of the United States to disgrace a man, to put him out of his office, and perhaps cover him with a mantle of shame so that he may never hold any other office under the Government of the United States, whether it would not be fair to let his counsel know, when they come before you, what charge they are to meet. If that had been done in this case when we brought here the judges associated with this respondent on the bench for years, the lawyers who practiced before him year after year, the men who knew him from boyhood up, who could tell you what kind of a man he was, there would have been no ruling that that testimony should be excluded, because there is nothing of that kind before the Senate.

We wanted to let the Senate know what kind of a man Judge Archbald is, what kind of a judge he is, and to that end we had witnesses by the score who surrounded him and have known him for many years, and who respect him and love him, but their mouths were closed because there was no such charge made here.

Now after having closed our mouths and kept out that evidence, they say to you, "Judge Archbald is the kind of a man who ought to be removed from office on general principles," or on some idea of "a system." Just what is the theory I do not know, but I presume the learned chairman of the managers will inform us before the case comes to a close.

I ask Senators to remember, while they are dealing with a judge of the Circuit Court of the United States, temporarily assigned to the Commerce Court, they are dealing here with the rights of every civil officer of the Government. It is not a question of judges alone, but a question of the President and Vice President and Cabinet officers and of every officer of the United States, which I suppose includes every official whose appointment has to be confirmed by the Senate, if it does not include Senators and Members of the House.

I am not here to contend that there might not be some provision for putting out of office a President or a Vice President or a Cabinet officer or a judge who is for any reason incompetent to properly perform the duties of his office, but there is no such provision in the Constitution of the United States at present. We have had illustrations here of men who have become unfit for their office and who could not perform the duties of their offices. The case of Judge Pickering is the earliest one. In that case, as it was claimed, the respondent had become insane but the Senate removed him, not on that ground apparently, but because he had come into the court in a drunken condition and had there behaved in a disorderly and disgraceful manner.

But a man may be disqualified in other ways. Twice members of the Supreme Court of the United States have become absolutely disqualified for the performance of their duties. If an officer may be removed because he is not able for one reason to perform the duties of the office, he may be removed because he is so disabled for any other reason. Mr. Justice Hunt was paralyzed, and for that reason unable to attend to his judicial duties, or even to attend the court.

And so of Mr. Justice Moody, who was formerly Attorney General. He now lies upon a bed of pain and sickness with perhaps little expectation of ever getting up from it. Would you impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors for being incapable of the performance of the duties of his office?

I certainly would aver that no Member of the House of Representatives would ever come here with such a contention, and if he did he would never get a vote in favor of the proposition that Mr. Justice Moody should be removed because he committed the high crime and misdemeanor of becoming incapable by reason of illness of performing his judicial duties. Instead of that you passed an act of Congress which allowed him to retire as though he had reached 70 years of age and had served 10 years upon the bench.

And let me remind you that you have in the case at bar a perfectly clear case of absence of any charge which relates to anything that has been done in the performance of the duties of the office which Judge Archbald holds. He is not charged with committing any crime. That is admitted. He is not charged even with doing anything wrong in connection with the duties of the office, crime or no crime.

Says Mr. Manager CLAYTON, at pages 889 and 890 of this record:

> We make no charge of any misbehavior in connection with official duties.

Says he again:

> We make no charges of partiality.

And at page 941 Mr. STERLING agrees with that proposition.

Now, Senators, as I have a few moments before the hour for adjournment, let me speak of something relating to the merits of this case, as I have said now all that I intend to say about the law, except as I may add a word to what my brother Simpson so well said upon the question of the last six articles.

Mr. Manager HOWLAND complains because we have raised an issue of law and an issue of fact in this case; that our first answer to each article of impeachment is that what is charged is not an impeachable offense; and that, in the second place, we proceed to confess and avoid—terms well known in lawyer's lingo. If he can find any case in the history of this country in which an issue of law of this character was submitted otherwise than at the end of the trial in an impeachment case, he can find some case that has not been referred to in this hearing and is not to be found in the books. In every case, instead of having a demurrer to the articles of impeachment considered, the whole matter has gone over to the final vote. Indeed, Mr. Manager Bingham in the Johnson impeachment trial contended that a demurrer to an article of impeachment had never been allowed.

Now, as to the defense here—and I am particular about this, because I think the Managers, and especially Mr. Manager HOWLAND, have unintentionally not fairly stated what is our defense on the facts. He says we confess and avoid. We do nothing of the kind.

These articles charge that Judge Archbald did certain things. In the first article it is charged that he had certain communications with officers of the Erie Railroad Co.; in the second article, that he saw Mr. Loomis, and so on. We admit these facts. And so as to the other articles. Then the article goes on to charge that the respondent did corruptly, unlawfully, and wrongfully use his judicial influence in those transactions. We deny that he used his judicial influence corruptly; we deny that he used it wrongfully; we deny that he used it unlawfully; and we deny that he used it at all.

I say now, at the conclusion of the evidence in this case, having come down to the time when the final vote is to be taken in this Chamber, if you take all the evidence that has been produced before you, it leaves this case just where it was when it started; that it is proved that Judge Archbald did the things which in his answer he admits he did, and it is not proved that in regard to any of them he used his judicial influence wrongfully, unlawfully, or corruptly, or that he used it at all.

The articles which I wish particularly to refer to are article 1, which refers to the Katydid dump transaction; article 3, which refers to what is known as the Packer No. 3 dump; article 6, which refers to a conversation between Judge Archbald and Mr. Warriner in reference to certain alleged favors for a Mr. Dainty—there is nothing of that kind in the article, but that is what we are now told it is intended to charge—and article 13, which is an attempt to gather up a number of things which are not specified.

That article charges, in the first place, that while Judge Archbald was district judge and circuit judge he entered into a scheme to raise money from litigants in his court by getting them to discount notes made by him or indorsed by him, and also entered into another scheme to get coal property from certain railroads, which are named, and other railroads not named which had litigation in the Commerce Court.

I intend in the discussion of those articles to take them up practically in their inverse order and discuss them in what I consider to be the order of their importance, as indicated by the amount of evidence which has been taken in regard to them.

About article 6 I shall say but a word, and that is this: The charge there is that Mr. Dainty—I am speaking now of the evidence and not of what is in the article—came to Judge Archbald and mentioned the fact that the Everhart heirs, who have been referred to here so often, had outstanding claims against certain coal property of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., and that it was desired that Judge Archbald should get that company through Mr. Warriner to purchase those interests of the Everhart heirs; that is, that they would get them in, the company being supposed to be very desirous of getting in these interests; and in consideration of that act of kindness to the coal company the respondent would ask it to lease a certain tract of land, called the Morris & Essex tract, to Mr. Dainty. The managers put upon the stand two witnesses to testify to that transaction; one of them was Mr. Dainty and the other Mr. Warriner. Each of them absolutely and positively denied the charge.

Mr. Warriner said that while Judge Archbald had spoken to him about the Everhart heirs' interest, as to which Judge Archbald was himself concerned, as we show here in reference to the Katydid matter, that he never connected that in any manner with the application that Mr. Dainty was to make for the lease to him of what was called the Morris & Essex tract. Mr. Warriner said that as the respondent was about to leave the office of Mr. Warriner he simply mentioned the fact that Mr. Dainty was going to make application, or had made application, for this lease for the Morris & Essex tract, and Mr. Warriner told him it was not to be leased. That was the end of it.

Mr. Dainty testified that in his conversation with the respondent no suggestion was made of a lease of the Morris & Essex tract as a consideration for the getting in of the Everhart interests, and he further says that he did not know whether the respondent did, in fact, see Mr. Warriner in regard to the matter.

Now, Senators, I call your attention to this remarkable fact: That after Mr. Dainty had been on the stand and declared most positively that there was no connection between those two matters, and after Mr. Warriner had been on the stand and testified that, according to his recollection, the two matters were never mentioned as having any relation to each other at all—so that by the testimony of the only two witnesses the managers produced on this point their whole claim was proven to be untrue—after that, when Judge Archbald came on the stand himself, after hearing the testimony of those witnesses and knowing that by no possibility could any other witness have personal knowledge on the subject, he said that, according to his recollection, he did tell Mr. Warriner that Mr. Dainty had suggested the leasing to him (Dainty) of the Morris & Essex tract in consideration of the services which he proposed to render the company in inducing the Everharts to convey their interests in other lands to the company.

Could there be a clearer illustration of the fact that you are dealing with an honest man? It is impossible to conceive that the respondent did not know when he took the stand and told that story that he was giving the only evidence in the case on which the managers could possibly rely to maintain their claim.

Assume that it is so. Assume now that Mr. Dainty did come to Judge Archbald and say, "Judge, I would very much like to get a lease of that Morris & Essex tract, which the coal company owns, and I can confer a great favor upon that railroad company by getting in the interests of these Everhart heirs. They have the interests of a lot of them. They have paid a hundred thousand dollars or so for certain portions of them, and these other people, I think, will convey their interests to them; and I will be willing to accomplish that for them if they will give me a lease in the other tract." If he did suggest that to Mr. Warriner and Mr. Warriner simply said, "We can not lease the Morris & Essex tract, but we will pay the Everhart heirs what we paid the others," and that was the end of the matter, it is impossible to see how that was a high crime or misdemeanor, or any kind of a crime or misdemeanor, or anything for which he could be reproved.

Mr. President, it is now within three minutes of 6 o'clock, and I should like to suspend the argument at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour for adjournment of the Senate sitting as a court has so nearly arrived, only two minutes remaining, the Chair does not suppose counsel wish to occupy that time. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. I move that the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 10, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 9, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, quicken the good spirit within us that it may respond to the call for service. The opportunities are great, the call is insistent. We may none of us become heroes, but we pray that we may fulfill the common daily duties of life patiently, promptly, efficiently, without ostentation, that we may thus ennoble and glorify ourselves in Thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT OPELIKA, ALA.

The SPEAKER. A change of reference is requested from the calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the House Calendar of the bill (H. R. 27827) to amend section 70 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. If there be no objection, that change of reference will be made.

Mr. MANN. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is to change the bill from one calendar to the other.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, that seems to be a bill that is properly within the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee. My duties elsewhere have caused me to be absent from some sessions. Is it proposed to change the reference from the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. No; it is a bill which has been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee. It is now on the Union Calendar, where it was placed by mistake. It adds a new place for holding the district court in one of the Alabama districts. There is no expense attached to it and evidently it does not belong on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to know what the proposed change was.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the bill indirectly makes a charge on the Treasury it was properly referred to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Very true, but it does not do that.

Mr. HARDWICK. If it involves a new Federal district, I think it does.

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Clerk will read the last paragraph in the report of the Judiciary Committee on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The erection of a public building at Opelika has been authorized by law. The bill now reported by your committee provides that, until the Government building shall be erected, suitable court rooms, accommodations, etc., shall be furnished free of expense to the Government. This will be done by the authorities of Lee County at Opelika.

The bill does not create any new office.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that it simply provides a new place for holding court in a district already established. Is there objection to the proposed change from the Union Calendar to the House Calendar?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. At the adjournment of the last session several points of order had been reserved. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if they are insisted upon.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order on the two provisions which have gone over until to-day. My only idea in this matter was that this amount should be paid from the tribal fund of these Indians instead of out of the Treasury as a gratuity. After looking into the matter somewhat I have changed my mind about it and wish to withdraw the point of order and offer an amendment, if I may be given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the point of order, Mr. Chairman, on the pending paragraph, I would like to inquire if an amendment of that kind will be agreeable to the other side?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say that I can not agree to any such proposition. I think I can demonstrate satisfactorily to the Chair that the item is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma related to the merits of the proposition and not to the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand. It is a treaty obligation, and, furthermore, about one-half of the Indians being without any funds from which we may reimburse the Government, and, furthermore, because we have already provided for the support of such Indians as have funds out of their own funds, I can not consent to the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not a fact that not one penny of the money that we provide for schools in your State is reimbursable?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No part of the money provided for education; and no part of the item now under consideration is used for education.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not true that three schools—the one at Flandreau, the one at Pierre, and at Rapid City—are specifically provided for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly. But the Flandreau School is located about 2 miles on the east side of the State from the line, and the attendance of that school is from a number of States—Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Dakota. Out of the whole number of children being educated at these three schools the gentleman refers to they only take care of 700 or 800 pupils.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not true that in the entire State of South Dakota there are 20,352 Indians?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My recollection is that it is something like that number, but that does not include the schools in North Dakota, that portion of the Standing Rock which resides in North Dakota, and some Sioux that live over in Nebraska.

Mr. FERRIS. They are provided for elsewhere, are they not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No; this is for the support of the Sioux. The gentleman has in mind the educational item. The item which the gentleman from Illinois made the point of order against was the item that provides for an appropriation for subsistence. The educational item is a separate item.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to inquire what the subsistence item is used for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. For the purpose of civilization; some of it is used for rations. Every able-bodied Indian able to work, instead of having rations issued to him, is paid so much a day for the labor for work upon the roads and other work upon the reservation. I may say that as to the helpless and very aged the department has got away from the system of issuing rations, and is using the money that the rations represent in employing the Indians and paying them and letting them buy their own subsistence.

Mr. FERRIS. How many people are employed on the $307,000 item?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not say, but not a very large number. Each agency, of course, has, as the gentleman is quite well aware, a superintendent and a financial clerk and such other employees as may be necessary at the agency. I do not think there are over five or six, if you do not count the police; and then we have a subagent, who has employees and farmers and matrons.

Mr. FERRIS. It is true that these Indians have a cash deposit amounting to some $3,000,000, is it not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is a trust fund that is on deposit credited to the Indians amounting to $3,000,000. That bears 5 per cent interest, and it provides that one-half of the interest may be spent annually for education and the other half may be paid to the Indians per capita. It is also provided that after a certain number of years, I think 10 years, the Secretary of the Interior may spend 10 per cent of the $3,000,000 fund, but he has not expended any part of it, and at the expiration of 50 years the amount is expended as provided by the agreement in the treaty.

Mr. FERRIS. It is also true that these 20,000 and over Indians have property amounting to $41,015,702.05.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not say as to that. These Indians have allotments, but they are mostly only fit for grazing purposes. So far as being valuable for producing crops, they are practically not worth anything.

Mr. FERRIS. Is any part of the $307,000 used for tribal schools?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand not.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not know how much is used for salaries or how much for rations and subsistence?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think I could tell by referring to the justification that was furnished. The gentleman will remember that the estimates were about $300,000 in excess of what we are appropriating, and therefore the expenditures would include everything that has been paid out both from the money appropriated and the money belonging to the Indians.

Mr. FERRIS. I see here that there is $200,000 for schools and another item, subsistence, $14,000. What is the $14,000 used for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Fourteen thousand dollars; I presume the gentleman refers to that item for the Yankton Agency. That is to maintain the agency of the Yankton Indians. Many of them are old, and, as the gentleman knows, the Government supervises the leasing of the land, the selling of inherited lands, the deposit of funds, the paying of money from time to time, teaching them agriculture, and so forth. Fourteen thousand dollars is to cover the expenses, and is similar to the items that are carried in the bill for the agencies generally.

Mr. FERRIS. While the gentleman from South Dakota was chairman of the committee I noticed that his policy was, and as he stated on the floor and in the committee, that in the future, where the Indians had any money, they should pay their own expenses.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As far as possible.

Mr. FERRIS. Pursuant to that idea he incorporated the following language in the bill relative to the Kiowa Indians in Oklahoma:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds on deposit to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, for the support of the agency and pay of employees maintained for their benefit.

If that was good, and if the rule should be uniform wherever the Indians have money, does not the gentleman think we ought to let the Indians in South Dakota take from their funds to pay the agency?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, we have to consider in each instance the law, and in some instances agreements that may be in existence between the tribes and the United States, and my recollection is that in connection with the Kiowa and Comanche Tribes—and if I am mistaken the gentleman will correct me—there is something that authorizes that, and the gentleman will recall that a treaty was made with the Kiowa and Comanche Indians for the sale of their surplus lands, and the consideration was to be $1,000,000; that when the treaty came here for ratification the Senate put in an amendment that a certain area should be reserved for the use in common of the Indians for a pasture, and that amendment was adopted and it became a law. The Secretary of the Interior, on his own initiative, reserved 25,000 acres for a wood pasture, which was not sold. Later there was legislation authorizing the sale of these five hundred thousand and odd acres of land which we had previously purchased from the Indians, and the proceeds went into the Treasury to their credit, to the extent of several millions of dollars. We have in that instance been appropriating for their support out of their funds. I do not think the cases are identical, although in South Dakota, as the gentleman knows, this bill provides that so far as the Cheyenne, Standing Rocks, and Rosebuds are concerned, their support shall come from their funds.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the item is clearly subject to a point of order, and unless the gentleman desires to be heard further upon the merits, I desire to present the authorities that I think sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the particular paragraph to which he made the point of order?

Mr. FERRIS. I make the point of order to the paragraph under consideration, beginning with line 19, on page 26, and extending over to page 27, down to line 9. It is the $307,000 item. The language of the paragraph recites that this appropriation is made pursuant to article 13 of the treaty of April 29, 1868. I read from article 10 of that treaty:

In lieu of all sums of money, or other annuities provided for, to be paid to the Indians herein named, under any treaty or treaties heretofore made, the United States agrees to deliver at the agency house on the reservation herein named, on or before the 1st day of August in each year, for 30 years, the following articles.

Then the next article set out the articles—oxen, cows, blankets, and what not.

I think there will be no dispute that the article of the treaty contained in the treaty of 1868 has expired for more than 4 years. The contention of gentlemen on the other side will be that the treaty of 1877 abrogates and takes away the limitation provided in the treaty of 1868. The 1868 treaty was for a period of 20 years, and it provided certain commodities should be furnished the Indians in lieu of the ceded lands. Then, in 1889 an act was passed which extended it until 1908. That treaty then expired, on which there is no other legislation that I have been able to find, except the treaty of 1877. I think it is correct that the treaty of 1868 has expired, and unless revived by the treaty of 1877 this item is clearly subject to a point of order.

I read now from volume 19 of the United States Revised Statutes at Large, article 5. I find this language in the treaty of 1877:

In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization, to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for in the treaty of 1868.

That is one place where the Indians have ceded the lands, and where the Federal Government agrees to do certain things, but reciting that it is subject to the limitations of the treaty of 1868, which has at this time expired. Again, in article 8 of the same volume—volume 19—United States Statutes at Large, page 256, article 8 provides:

The provisions of the said treaty of 1868, except as herein modified, shall continue in full force, and that the provisions of this agreement shall apply to any country which may hereafter be occupied by the said Indians as a home, and Congress shall by appropriate legislation secure to them an orderly government; they shall be subject to the laws of the United States and each individual shall be protected in his rights of property, person, and life.

The treaty on which they rely is the treaty of 1877, and in the specific places just read, one being the first part of article 5, and the other being article 8 of the treaty of 1877, which is relied upon, cited as authority for this appropriation. It is specifically provided that this treaty, and the Indians, for the cession made, shall be subject to the limitations set forth in the treaty of 1868. I do not know what could be more specific.

The CHAIRMAN. The idea of the gentleman is that the rights conferred under the act of 1877 shall expire as of the time the treaty of 1868 shall expire.

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely, and let me again emphasize that point. The thing the Indians did to bring about this treaty was to cede certain lands. The thing the Federal Government did was to grant them certain school privileges, annuities, and certain blankets and oxen. Let me again read, for here is the milk in the coconut, the very contract itself, the thing the Federal Government agreed to do:

In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights, and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization, to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts as provided for in the treaty of 1868.

Mr. Chairman, one word upon the merits of this proposition. The State of South Dakota has three schools specifically provided for, aggregating from $50,000 to $65,000 each. The State of South Dakota has not a single reimbursable item in the whole State. The Indians have $3,000,000 in cash and they have $41,000,000 in property. They have only 20,000 Indians in the whole State. I understand that this is not debating the point of order, but I state it in justification of my reservation of the point of order. When this matter was considered I did not know that it was subject to a point of order, and I did not know that the succeeding paragraph was subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman one or two questions. I do not quite follow just what the point of order is, and I would ask the gentleman to repeat it in order that I may know just what he is contending for.

Mr. FERRIS. My point of order is, first——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me ask the gentleman this question: The first item in this paragraph is an item that is provided for under article 13 of the treaty of 1868. Now, does the gentleman raise a point of order as to that item?

Mr. FERRIS. I raise it as to the paragraph, and I will state my grounds in my own way. My point of order is that this is carried on its face as a treaty item when there is no unexpired treaty in support of it. The further provision is that there is no authority of law and, further, that there is no authority of law for it, either in treaty or in statute.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the argument presented by the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat. I shall very briefly endeavor to answer what he has stated, and then endeavor to convince the Chair that this item is in order. The gentleman read from the treaty of 1877, which I want to refer to, and he reads article 5, but before commenting upon that part of his point of order, I want to call the Chair's attention to the first item that appears in the paragraph against which the point of order has been made, and I would call the Chair's attention to article 13 of the treaty of 1868, which provides:

The United States hereby agrees to furnish annually to the Indians the physician, teacher, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmiths, as herein contemplated, and that such appropriation shall be made from time to time on the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior as will be sufficient to employ such persons.

Now, there is no limitation in that language and therefore the treaty is still in effect and therefore, so far as that part of the paragraph is concerned, it is not subject to a point of order. And the same is true as to the next item, which provides for the pay of a second blacksmith; and I would cite in support of that item article 8 of the treaty of 1868, and I will only read the concluding part:

And it is further stipulated that such persons as may commence farming shall receive instructions from the farmer herein provided for, and whenever more than 100 persons shall enter upon the cultivation of the soil a second blacksmith shall be provided, with such iron and steel and other material as may be needed.

And I say there is no limitation as to that article of the treaty of 1868 and therefore, so far as these two items are concerned, the point of order will not lie.

Now, the gentleman directs his arguments to the portion of the paragraph which provides for the subsistence of the Sioux, and so forth, and he cites the treaty of 1877, or a part of that treaty, and he reads from article 7:

In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights—

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman reading from article 7?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am reading from article 5 of the treaty of 1877, on page 170:

In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights, and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization, to furnish them schools of instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

In other words, the gentleman is now contending that the consideration for that cession, which was a hundred miles square, and said to be the richest hundred-mile square in the world, was to do for these Indians what we had already obligated ourselves to do by prior treaty, namely, the treaty of 1868. He states with emphasis, and he reads it the second time, that in consideration of this cession the United States will do only what it has already contracted to do by the treaty of 1868.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it goes on further—he did not read it all—and says:

Also to provide the said Indian with subsistence, consisting of a ration for each individual, of a pound and a half of beef, or, in lieu thereof, one-half pound of bacon, one-half pound of flour, one-half pound of corn; and for every 100 rations, 4 pounds of coffee, 8 pounds of sugar, and 3 pounds of beans, or, in lieu of said articles, the equivalent thereof in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Such rations, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be continued until the Indians are able to support themselves.

Is there any limitation of that language? Is there anything about the treaty of 1868 which limited some of these requirements to 20 or 30 years? Not a word. And as I have repeatedly stated on the floor of this House, this treaty of 1877, which the Indians have found much fault with, is the best treaty from the standpoint of the Indian that has ever been entered into by the Indians of the United States, because it is not limited. And until these Indians are self-supporting the United States is obligated to support them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I have this treaty before me, and without taking the time to return to it, there is some language in this provision that the Chair inquired about the other day and wanted to know if there is anything that authorized the language that has reference to the sum appropriated to include transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation, and that in this service Indians shall be employed wherever practicable. I find, Mr. Chairman, in this same treaty of 1877, this language:

And will also employ Indians, so far as practicable, in the performance of Government work upon their reservation.

In other words, the United States stipulated and promised that as far as practicable they would employ Indian labor, and in the matter of transportation I have noticed for many years that practically all of the transportation of Indian supplies from the point where received on the railroad or the river to the agency has been by Indian labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was suggested the other day, and with considerable emphasis by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], that this was an effort to obtain an appropriation. He used this language:

The treaty of 1877, conjured from somewhere, the Lord only knows, is intended—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when this treaty was ratified in 1877 Congress began making appropriations for the support and subsistence and civilization of the Sioux Indians, and if the gentleman will take the act of 1877 he will find the same language as appears in this act, and so on down in every single Indian appropriation act up to the present time. And there never has been one dollar appropriated in all these years except under the treaty of 1877. Never before, I think, Mr. Chairman, has anyone raised a point of order against it.

This appears to be, so far as I am able to ascertain, the first time that a point of order has been made against this item. But it does appear very clearly that whoever prepared the item originally exercised great care and endeavored to follow the provisions of the treaty, and the fact that it has gone on from 1878 down to the present time is pretty good evidence, it seems to me, that the treaty of 1877 authorizes this appropriation.

Now, I want to refer for a moment to the treaty or agreement, as it is called, of 1889. I want to read section 19 of the act of March 2, 1889, which ratified an agreement made with the Sioux Tribe of Indians. Section 19 provides that—

All the provisions of the said treaty with the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians concluded April 29, 1868, and the agreement with the same approved February 28, 1877, not in conflict with the provisions and requirements of this act, are hereby continued in force according to their tenor and limitations, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now there, Mr. Chairman, we have a later agreement, made in 1889, wherein it was expressly provided that it was not to impair former treaty obligations and wherein it was stipulated that they were to be continued in force according to their tenor and limitations—"anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding," it said.

How could anything be more positive? How could anything be put in the English language more effectively to express what was meant than that language? So I apprehend that when my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says that we have conjured up and brought in here an appropriation not justified by a treaty he spoke hastily. I think he spoke without considering fully whether or not he was justified in making that statement.

Now, I have stated that this appropriation has been made for 40 years in the language that appears in the bill at the present time, and I want to say further that as regards the question of the two other items referred to in the treaty of 1868 three or four years ago we carefully went through the bill and eliminated every item that we thought was not justified by the treaty obligations of the Government, and as to these two provisions we found that they were still in full force and effect, and therefore we provided for them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I need not go further into the merits. I think I have said sufficient to satisfy the Chair that this appropriation is justified by the treaty and that the treaty obligation of the Government requires that this or some other appropriation be made in accordance with its provisions.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order. At the risk possibly of repeating some things that my colleague [Mr. BURKE] has already very ably and forcibly said, I think this point of order, raised for the first time after a uniform interpretation of this treaty for 36 years, is sufficiently unusual to justify its further discussion.

I think that the proper interpretation to be given to this treaty will be better understood by a consideration of some of the circumstances under which it was made. In the year 1874, as a result of what is known as the Custer expedition, gold was discovered in the Black Hills, in western-southern Dakota. Prospectors immediately began rushing into that country, particularly in 1875 and in the fore part of 1876. The Government had its Army out upon the frontier to forcibly eject the white prospectors from that country, because it was Indian territory.

It was at that time well known to be prospectively, at least, very rich in gold. This treaty was made under those circumstances. A commission was appointed to come to terms, if possible, with the Sioux Indians, so that this territory might be acquired by the Government. The first efforts in the council with the Indians were unsuccessful, and ended in a very serious threat of trouble to our commissioners. Later, in the month of September, 1876, at Red Cloud, in Nebraska, immediately to the south of this territory, another council was held which led to the making of this treaty.

Now, the Chair will notice these conditions: Something supposed to be very valuable was desired by the Government by means of a treaty. The inhabitants of the country were all rushing in to take possession of this territory forcibly, and——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I will ask the gentleman if in article 4 of the treaty of 1877, on which he relies, the Indians did not specifically agree that they would remove to the Indian Territory? And I will ask him whether it is not true, as a matter of fact, that they did not remove at all, thereby totally breaking the treaty?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the fact?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is left optional with the Indians. They can go there and establish a home if they desire to do so, but, in fact, they did not desire to do it. The treaty of 1889 was a further revision of that question of their domicile.

Mr. FERRIS. Article 4 sets out the conditions upon which they are to be liable for anything.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I hope that the gentleman will not be driven by the absurdity of his point of order to an assumption of the position that the Government does not own the Black Hills. That is a position that the Indians have sought to force upon us. Although the treaty of 1868 provided that all subsequent treaties should be ratified by three-fourths of the male adult Indians, this treaty was in fact ratified by the authorized chiefs, and the Indians accepted the benefits of the treaty, and it thereafter became ratified by the treaty of 1889 by the signature of three-fourths of the Indians. But if the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is right in his contention that this treaty is not in force, where are we?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In a moment. We would be left under the necessity of recognizing the Indian title to a country that has often been referred to as the richest 100 miles square on the face of the globe. From this very territory, as to which the gentleman is now seeking to relieve the Government from its obligations, entered into for its purchase, in excess of $150,000,000 of gold has been taken from that time until now, and that country is now producing gold in round figures to the extent of $10,000,000 every year.

Now, the Indians would be very glad, indeed, to be placed in status quo and relieved of the obligations of that treaty.

It is perfectly absurd here, after an interpretation placed upon this treaty by the Indians, by the Indian Bureau, and by Congress uninterruptedly for 36 years, for the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], even under the smart of a counter irritant from my distinguished colleague [Mr. BURKE] some days ago in Oklahoma matters, to attempt to dig up and overturn something that has been accepted as an interpretation for 36 years.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. If the interpretation had been accepted for 36 years, and it was wrongly accepted at first, then it would be wrong to accept it now, and time certainly does not bar the right to call attention to a treaty that has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. My suggestion is that, with all his ability, the gentleman perhaps has not succeeded at the end of 36 years in overturning the good sense and knowledge of this law which has been applied in Congress and out of it uninterruptedly during that period.

I have stated the surrounding circumstances, which the Chair as a lawyer will recognize at once as very proper to consider in aid to an understanding of the intention of the parties to this agreement of 1876. Certainly the Indian was expected to get something—and something of very great value—in consideration of the cession of that great gold territory. Now, the gentleman suggests this absurd interpretation, because at the end of the paragraph providing for numerous obligations that the Government is to discharge are these words: "As provided in the treaty of 1868." Because the language "as provided in the treaty of 1868" is a part of the paragraph, the gentleman would have the Chair interpret that the limitation of time—20 years—for certain acts in the treaty of 1868 was still to be a limitation here. In other words, that the Indians were to get absolutely nothing additional by virtue of this treaty.

The language as provided in 1868, used in section 5 of the treaty of 1876, is simply descriptive of the class and kind of educational facilities that are to be furnished. It is not simply a repetition of the time period of the treaty of 1868, but it is descriptive of the class and kind of educational facilities that are to be furnished; for instance, instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, "as provided by the treaty of 1868."

The distinguishing feature of this treaty of 1876 between the Government and the Sioux Indians is this, that for the first time, at least so far as these Indians are concerned, the Government undertook to enter into obligations for education, civilization, and support that were not to be limited by time, but were to continue indefinitely, or until the Indians were able to support themselves; and by applying that test to the interpretation of this treaty every provision of it is perfectly plain, and the surrounding circumstances which I have already narrated at once suggest and corroborate that interpretation.

Remember that that treaty of 1876 was made at Red Cloud, Nebr., under armed protection of the commissioners of the Government who were making the treaty. Remember that a gold territory, known to be immensely valuable, was the consideration for this treaty. Remember also that the Government had already agreed to furnish maintenance to these people for 30 years from 1868 and educational facilities for 20 years from 1868, and it was in 1876 when this second treaty was made and the Government was bound to furnish still for 12 years these educational facilities at the time the parties came together. And here is the absurd contention of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] that all that the Government agreed to do for these Indians in the way of education and civilization was simply to reiterate what they had already agreed to in 1868, although there were 12 years of that former treaty obligation still to run when this remarkable contract was entered into on the part of the Indians under these unusual circumstances. Listen to the language:

ART. 5. In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights—and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indian, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization—

A valuable consideration—

Not for a year or for two years or for three years, but—

All necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization.

And if there were nothing more about it than that part of the language it would justify the furnishing of schools indefinitely and as a part and parcel of appropriate aids to civilization.

By this agreement the Sioux Indians, in parting with their immensely valuable territory, assured themselves and their posterity of the assistance of the Government in the aid of civilization, and the ability to support themselves and their families however long that civilizing problem might take. Further—

To furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

That is to say, agricultural and mechanical arts are the kind of schooling to be furnished, as specified in the treaty of 1868.

Now, follow further—

Also to provide the said Indians with subsistence consisting of a ration for each individual of a pound and a half of beef (or in lieu thereof one-half pound of bacon), one-half pound of flour, and one-half pound of corn.

And so forth.

In the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—

As to equivalent rations. And now follows—

Such rations, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be continued until the Indians are able to support themselves.

There were obligations for rations and yearly annuities under the treaty of 1868, still in force, to continue for 30 years from 1868, or 22 years beyond the period of this treaty.

The contention here urged by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] would lead the Chair and the committee to this position: That under these extraordinary circumstances the Government, in consideration of the cession of that great gold territory, agreed that they would do just what they had agreed to do for the Sioux Indians by the treaty of 1868, which was still in force for 12 years, to wit, furnish them education in industrial and mechanical arts for 12 years, as provided in 1868—an absolutely absurd proposition.

My contention, which has been the interpretation of the department uniformly, is that the Sioux Indians by this treaty assured themselves of proper instruction in education and preparation for civilization until they were able to take care of themselves in these directions. In that way that interpretation gives vitality and some sense to the treaty. The interpretation of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] would leave us in the position that the Government acquired this great territory without any new obligations whatever as consideration for the cession of that territory.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Charman, I shall detain the Chair but a few minutes. The whole drift of the argument of the gentleman is that because for 36 years this has stood here and been appropriated for we should keep on indefinitely appropriating for it. Another contention is that the treaty of 1877 revitalizes, sweeps away, sets aside, puts in full force and effect an entirely new deal. If that contention were borne out by the facts or by the plain wording of the act of 1877, undoubtedly the gentleman would be correct, but when I read in section 3 these words and in two or three other places similar words, I can not gather by what rule of construction the gentlemen arrive at that contention. I will read from page 255. Section 3 reads as follows:

The said Indians also agree that they will hereafter receive all annuities appropriated by said treaty of 1868 and all subsistence and supplies which may be provided for them under the present or any future act of Congress at such points and places or such reservations in the vicinity of the Missouri River as the President of the United States shall designate.

The next paragraph provides that they shall remove and how the commission shall go and see if it is a suitable place for them, and then the fifth article specifically limits them to the provisions of 1868, and says it with all the emphasis that the words can convey.

Article 8, on the same page, says that these Indians shall receive their annuities, shall receive their support and civilization according to the rules and terms of the treaties of 1868, which the gentleman himself admits is extinct.

One of the gentlemen from South Dakota says the act of 1889, which is found in the United States Statutes at Large, volume 25, page 1894, section 17, and reads as follows:

SEC. 17. That it is hereby enacted that the seventh article of the said treaty of April 29, 1868, securing to said Indians the benefits of education, subject to such modifications as Congress shall deem most effective, secure to said Indians equivalent benefits of such education, shall continue in force for 20 years from and after the time this act shall take effect.

Certainly in the act of 1889 there is nothing enlarging the act of 1868. In the act of 1877 there is in three different articles specific reference to specific provisions, which provides that they are governed by the limitations of the act of 1868. If the act of 1868 has expired, and if the act of 1877 is the one on which they rely, and in three distinct articles of that act they hold that the Indians are bound by the articles and provisions of 1868, surely there is no warrant of law for it. If they are to be read in the same paragraph, why enact the latter one? If it is to take the place of that, why say it is to be construed in conjunction with it?

Again, Mr. Chairman, the whole act of 1877 is on the theory that the Indians will remove to the Indian Territory, a thing which they never did. In article 5, page 256, it is expressly provided that these payments shall be made according to the treaty of 1868 upon a strict compliance by the Indians with their contract, and they never have complied with it. They still live in South Dakota, and never have complied with the terms.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in a case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States the facts are so similar to those in the case we are now considering that I think that decision throws a strong light upon this matter and should guide the interpretation of such a treaty with an Indian tribe.

As I understand the situation confronting us here, it is contended by the gentlemen who are raising this point of order that while the treaty of 1868 between the United States Government and the Sioux provided for these articles contained in the paragraph objected to, it places a period of limitation of 30 and 20 years upon it. It is claimed on the other side by gentlemen in favor of the paragraph that by the treaty of 1877 a reasonable construction thereof must require that these items are to be appropriated for annually for a much longer period than that. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], on the other hand, further contends that it is not specifically stated in the treaty of 1877 that these benefits are to be given annually for a further period, and that therefore there is no warrant in law for them. Their position seems to be that the treaty of 1877 not specifically extending the time is to be construed against the Indians.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a parallel case, one in relation to the Choctaws. In 1820 the Choctaws ceded to the Federal Government a large portion of their land in Mississippi, about 4,000,000 acres, on terms which specified that in part consideration of that they were to have a tract of land west of the Mississippi River, which is the land they now hold in Oklahoma. In 1830 another treaty was made with the Indians by which they ceded to the Federal Government all of their remaining land in Mississippi, consisting of more than 10,000,000 acres. In the entire treaty there was not one dollar expressed as consideration for the last cession. A great many years later there was a contention made that the Government was in duty bound to pay the Choctaws for the land in the last cession, even though the treaty did not say anything about the price to be paid. Finally the case went to the Court of Claims and, on appeal, to the Supreme Court of the United States. The case will be found in the One hundred and nineteenth United States, where the court uses language very instructive and appropriate in the consideration of the present point of order. I read, beginning on page 38 of the report:

It is true that by the eighteenth article of the treaty of 1830 it is provided that "for the payment of the several amounts secured in this treaty the lands hereby ceded are to remain a fund pledged to that purpose until the debt shall be provided for and arranged. And, further, it is agreed that, in the construction of this treaty, wherever well-founded doubt shall arise, it shall be construed most favorably toward the Choctaws." The only money payments secured by the treaty over and above the necessary expenditures in removing the Indians, in providing for their subsistence for 12 months after reaching their new homes, and paying for their cattle and their improvements are, first, an annuity of $20,000 for 20 years, commencing after their removal to the west; and, second, the amount to be expended in the education of 40 Choctaw youths for 20 years, and for the support of 3 teachers of schools for 20 years, together with the cost of erecting some public buildings, and furnishing blacksmiths, weapons, and agricultural implements, in addition to the several annuities and sums secured under former treaties to the Choctaw Nation and people. It is nowhere expressed in the treaty that these payments are to be made as the price of the lands ceded; and they are all only such expenditures as the Government of the United States could well afford to incur for the mere purpose of executing its policy in reference to the removal of the Indians to their new homes. As a consideration for the value of the lands ceded by the treaty they must be regarded as a meager pittance.

It is, perhaps, impossible to interpret the language of this instrument, considered as a contract between parties standing upon an equal footing and dealing at arm's length, as a conveyance of the legal title by the Choctaw Nation to the United States to hold as trustee for the pecuniary benefit of the Choctaw people, and yet it is quite apparent that the only consideration for the transfer of the lands that can be considered as inuring to them is the general advantage which they may be supposed to have derived from the faithful execution of the treaty on the part of the United States; and when in that connection it is considered that the treaty was not executed on the part of the United States according to its just intent and spirit, with a view to securing to the Choctaw people the very advantages which they had a right to expect would accrue to them under it, it would seem as though it were a case where they had lost their lands without receiving the promised equivalent. In such a case there is a plain equity to enforce compensation by requiring the party in default to account for all the pecuniary benefits it has actually derived from the lands themselves. This is the solid ground on which the justice of the award of the Senate of the United States under the treaty of 1855 seems to us fairly to stand.

Then, again, on page 27, the language I hold to be especially appropriate in construing the present treaties, there the court said:

As was said by this court recently in the case of the United States v. Kagama (118 U. S., 375, 383): "These Indian tribes are the wards of the Nation; they are communities dependent on the United States—dependent largely for their daily food, dependent for their political rights. They owe no allegiance to the States and receive from them no protection. Because of the local ill feeling, the people of the States where they are found are often their deadliest enemies. From their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection and with it the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive and by Congress, and by this court whenever the question has arisen."

It had accordingly been said in the case of Worcester v. Georgia (6 Pet., 515, 582): "The language used in treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense. * * * How the words of the treaty were understood by this unlettered people, rather than their critical meaning, should form the rule of construction."

The recognized relation between the parties to this controversy, therefore, is that between a superior and an inferior, whereby the latter is placed under the care and control of the former, and which, while it authorizes the adoption on the part of the United States of such policy as their own public interests may dictate, recognizes, on the other hand, such an interpretation of their acts and promises as justice and reason demand in all cases where power is exerted by the strong over those to whom they owe care and protection. The parties are not on an equal footing, and that inequality is to be made good by the superior justice which looks only to the substance of the right, without regard to technical rules framed under a system of municipal jurisprudence formulating the rights and obligations of private persons equally subject to the same laws.

The rules to be applied in the present case are those which govern public treaties, which, even in case of controversies between nations equally independent, are not to be read as rigidly as documents between private persons governed by a system of technical law, but in the light of that larger reason which constitutes the spirit of the law of nations. And it is the treaties made between the United States and the Choctaw Nation holding such a relation, the assumptions of fact and of right which they presuppose, the acts and conduct of the parties under them, which constitute the material for settling the controversies which have arisen under them. The rule of interpretation already stated as arising out of the nature and relation of the parties is sanctioned and adopted by the express terms of the treaties themselves. In the eleventh article of the treaty of 1855 the Government of the United States expresses itself as being desirous that the rights and claims of the Choctaw people against the United States "shall receive a just, fair, and liberal consideration."

I think that is exactly on all fours with the present situation. If the contention of the gentleman who has raised this point of order is correct, the Sioux Indians in South Dakota parted with a tract of land worth hundreds of millions of dollars and received absolutely nothing in return.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think the decision that he has just presented to the Chair more properly justifies a claim against the Government than an argument against a point of order made against the paragraph?

Mr. MILLER. Most assuredly the purpose of the case is to substantiate a claim against the Government. But what I am trying to say is that in the interpretation of a treaty, where it appears that the Government failed to pay or in specific terms to give something for what it got, then reason, justice, humanity, and law says that it shall be interpreted most favorably to the Indians, and they shall get their just demands. That is all that is asked for in this paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. But that would be in justification of a claim against the Government rather than to make the paragraph in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If there should be a legal claim against the Government, of course that would justify an item in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, I think the gentleman will agree that these various claims, equitable or of any character, that come in on an appropriation bill are subject to a point of order unless there be some specific authority for them. The case which the gentleman cites about the Choctaw lands is based on treaty obligations, and these are merely Executive orders.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota how the case arose?

Mr. MILLER. In 1855 a treaty was entered into and it was agreed that the Senate should investigate all those pending matters and make an award. They did make an award in 1859 and appropriated $250,000 finally to pay that, and that was all that was done under that treaty. They did not carry it out. Then in 1881 we authorized them to take this to the Court of Claims, which they did.

Mr. MANN. And all they could take to the Court of Claims was a legal claim, I assume, and these people might be able to take this to the Court of Claims as suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma; but if it is a case which they could take to the Court of Claims, then it is a case authorized by law, and if the Supreme Court sustained a claim on account of this old treaty, an item in an appropriation bill to provide for it would certainly have been in order.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not contend that under the Tucker and Bowman Act, which authorizes several committees of the House to send propositions to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts, any proposition they can refer to that court would be in order on an appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. No; but under the Bowman and Tucker Act the Court of Claims does not enter judgment at all; nor can such a case go to the Supreme Court of the United States. So this could not have been a reference under the Bowman and Tucker Act, because it got to the Supreme Court. Here was a case where apparently the Court of Claims sustained a claim and authorized or entered a judgment, which case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and that court sustained the judgment. Unless they had a legal claim they could not have sustained a claim in the Court of Claims.

Mr. FERRIS. How does the Chair know whether they had a legal claim or not until there is some finding of the Court of Claims upon it? There has been none in this case.

Mr. MANN. Of course it is for the Chair to determine whether in his opinion this law authorizes the item in the bill. That would also be a determination as far as the Chair is concerned of whether in his opinion a claim would lie against the Government.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if in the Choctaw case the court does not find that there were specific provisions in the treaty that the Government agreed to perform in order that the Choctaws might move west?

Mr. MILLER. That is exactly what the court did not find. The court found that there were several little things which the Government agreed to do, but in no case did it hold that they were to be considered as a consideration. The court says they were too small and insignificant, a mere bagatelle which the Government in its general relations toward the Indians ought to give them in any event; and excluding that, there being nothing in the treaty which says the Government shall pay for these lands, justice and equity and law require that the Government shall be held as a trustee and shall be held accountable to the Indians for the proceeds of the sale of their property.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It was for specific lands to which the Choctaws held patents.

Mr. MILLER. They never had a patent to any lands in Mississippi or in any other place until they got trust patents from the Government.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The patents were limited.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, they received a grant of lands in Mississippi and Oklahoma.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will ask the gentleman if the same court has not held that they did have a patent?

Mr. MILLER. They held that they had a title in fee, but not a patent.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Is it not a fact that the special act which gave the Choctaws the right to go into the Court of Claims referred all questions of both law and equity to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. It did; but the Supreme Court did not take exactly the same view that the Court of Claims took. The Supreme Court reviewed the entire case and decided it on the merits, having in view all the facts.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And said that equity demanded that they should comply.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that dispose of all the points of order in respect to the portion of the bill relating to South Dakota?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The next item is an item for education, and a separate proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Beginning with line 10? Is the point of order made to that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. What disposition is desired of that section?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman withdrew his point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. We have not yet reached the second paragraph, have we?

The CHAIRMAN. We are now at line 10, on page 27.

Mr. FERRIS. There is another paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands a point of order was made to that paragraph, beginning with line 10. The Chair wishes to know what disposition is desired as to that paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. I make a point of order against it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to discuss the item briefly, and I think I can prevail upon the gentleman to withdraw the point of order. Now, in regard to this reimbursable proposition——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I thought the point of order to the second paragraph was conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will refer to that as soon as he runs through these authorities.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the Chair desires some time in which to consult the authorities?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a few moments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And while the Chair is going through them, may we discuss the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that while he is considering them there will be an effort on the part of the gentlemen to reach an agreement.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will concede that I am somewhat familiar with the affairs of the Sioux Tribe of Indians in South Dakota. The gentleman is proceeding on the theory—and I think other gentlemen over there are—that the United States has been spending large sums of money for these Indians, and that it has been paid out of the Federal Treasury. The gentleman has called attention to the fact that there is a trust fund in the Treasury of the United States of $3,000,000, and I assume that each one of the gentlemen on that side who have discussed this question or considered it is laboring under the impression that that $3,000,000 was put into the Treasury by the Federal Government as a gratuity, in substance, to these Indians. Let me explain the situation as to the Sioux Tribe of Indians.

In 1889 the entire western half of South Dakota, with the exception of the Black Hills, was an Indian reservation, comprising about 20,000,000 acres, and this act of 1889 provided for the cession of about 9,000,000 acres, and it provided that the land disposed of during the first two years should be $1.25 an acre and after the two years 75 cents an acre, and all land disposed of at the end of three years should be disposed of by the Government at 50 cents an acre and reimbursed to the Government. Now, then, the law also provided that all the expense of surveying under the allotment and the moneys expended for stock, and cattle, and machinery, the building of houses, should be reimbursed from the proceeds received from the sale of the 9,000,000 acres of land; and not one dollar has ever been paid to the Indians of the moneys received from the sale of that 9,000,000 acres, except that they have in the Treasury a trust fund of $3,000,000.

I would like to call the gentleman's attention to that item. It provides that the Government shall pay 5 per cent interest on this $3,000,000 and use one-half of it for education, which has been done right along. The other half may be paid to the Indians per annum, and that is the only money the Indians have received under the treaty of 1889. At the expiration of 50 years what becomes of the fund? It shall be expended for the civilization and self-support amongst the said Indians or otherwise distributed among them, as Congress from time to time thereafter determines. In other words, we put into the Treasury as the proceeds of the Indian lands $3,000,000 and we propose to pay them interest at 5 per cent and use half of it for education, which we have been doing, pay them the other half per capita, and then at the end of 50 years we do not pay them the money at all and we still use that money for their support, civilization, and education. Now, on this question of schools, the gentleman from Oklahoma stated the other day, in reply to the answer of the gentleman from Illinois, and I want to be correct, that had he understood this paragraph that we are now discussing he never would have consented to it. Do I understand the gentleman wants to be understood as saying that he did not understand that?

Mr. FERRIS. I know that it is against the rules of the House to talk about matters occurring in committees——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am not talking about what happened in the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say this item, the proposition as to whether or not the treaty had expired, was never mentioned in the committee to me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is quite certain when he makes that statement. For the information of the committee and simply to show that the gentleman's memory is not good, because nobody would intimate, certainly, for a moment that he would make a misstatement, but in view of the large number of matters he has on his mind it is not strange that details sometimes escape his memory—but to show that his memory is not good I am going to read to the gentleman from the hearings of last year on this item, and I am going to ask if the gentleman ever heard that this was an extension of the treaty and whether he was informed in regard to the matter.

Mr. FERRIS. Just a moment. The gentleman is always generous, or usually so. Does the gentleman wish to ask me a direct question to which I told him "No"; and then refer to the hearings of a year ago?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if I understood him to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that he was not aware that this treaty had expired?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman understood me precisely, for I said that, and I do say it now.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman will not object if I read from the hearings?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman say that there was one word uttered anywhere as to the fact of whether this treaty had expired or not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am going to read from the hearings.

Mr. FERRIS. This year's hearings?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The hearings of 1911—last year's hearings. I assume that the gentleman, being a member of the committee at the time, would carry in his mind ordinarily matters as important as this.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman left me in the position, and I assented without any protest at the time, of having attempted in some manner to mislead this House. He said that I brought in a treaty here, "conjured up," I think he said, and was endeavoring to get an appropriation on a treaty that did not exist at all or had expired, namely, the treaty of 1877, and that in this item I was endeavoring to extend the treaty without its appearing so. That would be the inference, and I want to see whether he remembers this. Here is what the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] said:

> For the information of Mr. FERRIS, I will say that this appropriation for the support of schools among the Sioux has always been carried in a separate item in this part of the bill, because under the treaty of 1889 we were obligated to pay for the education of the Sioux, and that treaty expired, as I recall, in 1909. We have been making the appropriations since by extending the treaty, if you will notice, by that language, and it really is a gratuity, the same as the education of other Indians. This is to pay the expenses of the reservation schools generally. There are 20,000 Indians there, and instead of paying it out of the fund that is over further in the early part of the bill, it has been kept here, and I merely make this explanation so you may understand why this item is here.

Then I went on further:

> There is another reason why I prefer to have it that way. I have to come in contact with my Indians as you do with yours, Mr. FERRIS. They complain about things that we do. I call their attention to certain things. For instance, in this case I say to them, "We are giving you $220,000 that we did not agree to give to you and that we do not have to give to you. It shows that the Government is generous."
> Mr. FERRIS. The treaty expired in 1909?
> Mr. BURKE. Yes; it was a 20-year treaty.
> Mr. FERRIS. And, of course, now it is a gratuity?
> Mr. BURKE. It is a gratuity.

Now, it would seem that at that time, at least, the gentleman heard of this matter, and there was no subterfuge about it. The item bears upon its face evidence that it is an extension of that treaty from one year to another. I am simply calling it to the gentleman's attention because I do not think he intended by his remarks to put me in an attitude of deceiving or attempting to deceive the House or to deceive the committee or to seek to accomplish anything by means that were not proper. I know the gentleman did not intend to do that.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman states it exactly right, except in this, that the paragraph that was then under consideration was the preceding paragraph.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at all.

Mr. FERRIS. There were not any hearings even the year before last, and none this year.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It specifically refers to this item. This is the item we are discussing now.

Mr. FERRIS. But I was not discussing that item on Monday.

Mr. MANN. That was the item under consideration on Monday.

Mr. FERRIS. It was the $307,000 item.

Mr. MANN. No. That was passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. FERRIS. I think I am in error.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; I think the gentleman is in error. I do this in good faith. In passing I want to say that the gentleman used some very strong language the other day about the gentleman from South Dakota calling attention to the extravagance in connection with Indian affairs in Oklahoma and pointing to economy in South Dakota. I have no recollection of having done anything of the kind. The only thing I recall as having criticized was the extravagance in regard to the appropriations in Oklahoma. Why, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] himself said the other day that $20,000,000 was expended under the Dawes Commission and the other gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has repeatedly called attention to the great expense in the conduct of Indian affairs in Oklahoma. What I was endeavoring to do, so far as affairs in Oklahoma are concerned, was to get more money for administrative purposes there, and I was necessarily obliged to point out wherein I thought the Indians there were being wronged and why there should be more money appropriated for administrative purposes in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the gentleman's memory is also a little bit at fault. It has not been a week since the gentleman rose on the floor of this House and discussed very bitterly the administration of affairs in connection with probate judges in Oklahoma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I spoke of Federal appropriations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COVINGTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GEORGE G. HENRY.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency and acting under its instructions by unanimous vote, I present as privileged the contumacy of Mr. George G. Henry, of New York, who declined as a witness to answer certain questions propounded by counsel for the committee pertinent to the inquiry being had under House resolutions 429 and 504. I submit the report (H. Rept. 1285) of the committee, with the record of the proceedings had and the questions declined to be answered as a part thereof, with the request that the Speaker certify to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia the fact under the seal of the House, so that the said officer shall bring the matter before the grand jury of the District of Columbia for such action as may be authorized by sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

I now present the report. I now move pro forma, as the statute does not require the approval of the House, but preferring to have its action thereon, that the question of the contumacy of the witness, George G. Henry, be certified by the Speaker to the United States district attorney, under and by virtue of sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for such action as the grand jury may take.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] moves that the House give special authorization to the Speaker to certify the record to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself again into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am endeavoring to prevail upon the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] to withdraw his point of order, and I am not discussing the point of order. And in that connection, I want to call his attention to the fact that this $200,000 is the money that provides the agency and reservation schools upon the several Sioux reservations, and in order that the committee may know just how many schools there are, I would state that I have obtained the information from the Indian Office and will give it to the House.

There are maintained on these reservations 11 boarding schools and 60 day schools, and there are enrolled in these several schools 2,732 Indian children. I will say to the committee that the Sioux Indians are real Indians. They are not white Indians. Very few of them are of mixed blood. Within my recollection most of the Sioux Tribe were, you might say, savages, and most of them were what were known as "blanket Indians."

Now, I do not think that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] wants to deprive the Indians of these particular schools. These are the schools that everybody is for. There is occasional objection raised to what are known as nonreservation schools, but I have never heard any objection to the schools upon the Indian reservations, schools that are right out among the Indians. The pupils attend them the same as the white children go to our country district schools.

Of course, if the gentleman is objecting to the item because of the extension of the treaty, I am quite willing to eliminate that, and would offer the amendment in a different form. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order, of course, I will concede it, and offer the amendment in a form without that language which makes it subject to a point of order.

And I will say to the gentleman, for the purpose of saving time, that if he will indicate his position it has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that, perhaps, we might proceed with the bill while the Chairman is looking up these authorities, and recur to this item when he is ready to hear us on the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I will give the gentleman a statement of my position. The gentleman from South Dakota asked me to withdraw the point of order which was temporarily reserved to the paragraph in lines 10 to 16, inclusive, on page 27 of the bill, which appropriates $200,000 for schools in South Dakota.

My answer to the gentleman in that regard is that I am heartily in favor of these schools, and I have no doubt that at least some of them ought to be maintained; but the policy has been so well laid down by the gentleman, both while he was chairman of the committee and in almost every utterance of his, that where the Indians have large farms and large means they ought to pay their own way as far as possible. My position is that unless this be made reimbursable from their fund, they having $3,000,000 in cash and having $41,015,702.05 in property——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think we have a right to disturb the $3,000,000 pending the 50 years?

Mr. FERRIS. About that there can be no question. Congress can disturb any fund that the Indians have.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would it not be a violation of a solemn treaty obligation or agreement that was made with these Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all. The gentleman is disturbing them continually, and right in this bill we are withdrawing appropriations for schools all the way through.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then I understand the gentleman will make the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to be heard a moment, first. I think I will make the point of order. I will repeat again that in the State of South Dakota they have 20,000 Indians who have $3,000,000 in cash and have property amounting to $41,015,702.05. In this State they have three Indian schools specifically provided for. They have the same rights to the general lump-sum fund the rest of the Indians have, it amounting to $1,420,000.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What property does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. FERRIS. I refer to the property of the Indians. I get it from the statement. The gentleman can get it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. How is it classified?

Mr. FERRIS. It is found on page 6 of Document No. 486. It is available in the document room.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am quite familiar with the document, but I should like to ask the gentleman if that report shows what this property consists of and how it is classified.

Mr. FERRIS. It says "value of property and funds belonging to the Indians."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Made up by somebody in the Indian Office.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed for a moment, South Dakota has three schools specifically provided for, with 20,000 Indians. My State of Oklahoma has approximately 120,000 Indians, and we have only one school specifically provided for in the entire State out of the funds of the Federal Government. Every cent of the other expenses of the five-tribe schools is paid for from tribal revenues.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to correct the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me proceed. The gentleman has had plenty of time. In our State one school is specifically provided for and we have 120,000 Indians, or two-fifths of all the Indians of the United States. Every bit of the other expense for the entire five tribes of Indians is paid out of their own fund. We had thought on day before yesterday that perhaps there ought to be some gratuity appropriation for the Indian schools. The House thought otherwise. Certainly it can not be harmful to have a rule of universal application, and unless the gentleman will submit an amendment making this reimbursable, I feel it a duty to make the point of order. There certainly should be some uniformity about these appropriations. To appropriate from the Federal Treasury in one place and the Indians in another place is all wrong.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Before the gentleman submits the point of order, will he answer a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I will if I can.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand the gentleman to say to the House that not a dollar is expended for schools for the Indians in Oklahoma except at the Chilco School.

Mr. FERRIS. In the Five Tribes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But what about the Indians outside of the Five Tribes?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no school specifically provided for. I think they use a little of the general fund. There certainly is no school specifically provided for.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They are provided for out of the $1,420,000 item.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that applies to the few scattering tribes in the west of the State, but not to the Five Tribes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not to the Five Tribes; and when the gentleman says Oklahoma, he refers to the Five Tribes. There are a number of schools in Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Not one is specifically provided for except the Chilco School, and the children from Kansas use that school quite as much as the Oklahoma children do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I concede that this item is subject to a point of order, and I send to the Clerk's desk the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. What has become of the point of order?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I concede it.

Mr. MANN. Before the point of order is determined, the item appropriates for the support and maintenance of day and industrial schools among the Sioux Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that the item extends the treaty of 1889 until June 30, 1914, which is legislation?

Mr. MANN. Of course, the entire item is included in the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly. Now, I have offered an amendment with that eliminated. I thought perhaps the gentleman did not understand.

Mr. MANN. I thought the point of order was being made on the other ground.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained to the paragraph in the bill, and the gentleman from South Dakota sends up an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, after line 9, insert the following:

"For support and maintenance of day and industrial schools among the Sioux Indians, including the erection and repairs of school buildings, $200,000."

Mr. FERRIS. I make a point of order against that. The treaty has expired, and it is so conceded, and is new legislation not authorized by law.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair desires time to consider the other point of order, it has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois that this point of order be passed for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The point of order made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], is to the effect that the obligations imposed by the act of 1877 are impressed with a time limit by reason of the reference in section 5 of that act to the act of 1868. In view of this contention it is necessary to consider both the act of 1868, and the act of 1877. Under the act of 1868 the contracting parties respectively assumed certain obligations for value furnished, and to be furnished. The treaty of 1868 was one of limited duration. Later, by the act of 1877 the same contracting parties, entered into new relations on the part of the Indians an exceedingly valuable tract of land, a principality one might say, was ceded to the United States. This cession is referred to in the section cited by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], which in part is as follows:

ART. 5. In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

It is insisted by the gentleman from Oklahoma that this reference to the treaty of 1868 is intended to furnish a time limit for the discharge of the obligations imposed by the act of 1877, that limit being the limit fixed in the treaty of 1868. From the language that the Chair has read it will be seen that there was a cession of property, by the Indians, so that a new consideration was afforded for any obligations, or undertakings on the part of the United States toward the other contracting parties.

It is also insisted by the gentleman from Oklahoma that in the agreement of 1877 the Indians undertook on their part to go to the Indian Territory, and failing to carry out this undertaking, they have lost their rights against the United States. If the committee will bear with me, I will give the substance of so much of the act of 1877, as relates to the suggested change of habitation to the Indian Territory. (See p. 255.)

The Indians agreed that a delegation of five or more chiefs and principal men from each band should without delay visit the Indian Territory to examine the land, with a view to making it a permanent home, and if on this examination the report should be favorable, and satisfactory to their principals, that is, the Sioux Indians, then the Indians agreed that they would make the change. But a condition precedent was the investigation of this new territory, and the requirement that the recommendation, if favorable should be satisfactory to the Sioux Indians. Until this condition precedent was discharged, there was no obligation whatever on the part of the Indians to change their habitat.

No evidence has been adduced to show that any delegation on the part of the Sioux made the investigation contemplated, or that if they did, and made a report, this report was satisfactory to the principals. Hence there is no reason to conclude that the Sioux have ever incurred any obligation to remove to the Indian Territory, or failed in any duty in this respect.

Referring again to the section of the act of 1877 in which reference is made to the treaty of 1867, the Chair will cite anew the language used in that connection.

ART. 5. In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States do agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

Obviously there are two meanings that may be given to this reference to the treaty of 1868. First, the one suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma that it is intended thereby to fix a time limit on the obligations of the United States under the act of 1877. Second, that it was intended to save description in the second act and to use the language of the treaty of 1868 to show in detail what was intended by, and comprehended under the words "to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization, to furnish to them schools, and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts." Under the first suggestion it will be seen that the United States would secure an immensely valuable tract of land, for practically no consideration. If the second view is the correct view, then the United States is merely thereby held to the discharge of obligations which, in the light of what this Government has received from these Indians, are essentially reasonable.

If the interpretation of this treaty is in doubt, then this doubt must be resolved by resort to the fundamental principles for the interpretation of treaties, or agreements between a great nation like ours, and aboriginal savages. Obviously these contracting parties are not on an equal footing, and dealing at arm's length. Hence in the construction of the language under consideration, as between the two conflicting views, that one should be adopted which is most favorable to the weaker, and practically, helpless party, and which in addition conforms to essential justice by requiring the United States to afford adequate return for the highly valuable consideration furnished by the other contracting party.

The Chair concludes therefore that the reference made to the treaty of 1868 was not intended to impose the limitations of the treaty of 1868 on the obligations assumed by the act of 1877, but was designed to save words, and avoid a restatement in detail of what the Government assumed to do, when it undertook to provide all necessary aid.

Another thing, to which the Chair wishes to call attention is that the act of 1877 and the treaty of 1868 seem to be most highly regarded. I find in the act of 1889 a most unusual provision, to the effect that anything that occurs in the treaty of 1868, and the agreement of 1877 is to be held as in force anything in the act of 1889 to the contrary notwithstanding.

Of course, as a rule as between subsequent and antecedent acts, if there is any conflict between the two relating to one subject matter, there is a repeal by implication of the former act, but in this instance it is provided that in case of conflict the subsequent statute shall give way to the antecedent acts. This provision clearly shows that this Government reestablished by the act of 1889 in the most emphatic fashion, the rights of the Indians under the treaty of 1868, and the agreement of 1877.

Since these agreements are made the repository of the Indians' rights, they should be favorably construed in their interests according to the principles cited.

Looking to the treaty of 1868 and the agreement of 1877 it is clear that the Government undertook to do many things for the Indians, and specifically agreed to assist them in the work of civilization.

It is familiar authority that once a policy is established by law, Congress may appropriate to carry out that policy, and provide for the agents and agencies, fairly within the same. If a department is authorized to make investigations, an appropriation bill may provide for the agents needed for this purpose. Under the head of assisting these Indians in the work of civilization, many things may be appropriated for.

The Chair will not take up any further time of the committee, but looking to the provision for the payment of teachers, for physicians, blacksmiths, and additional employees, as well as for the other items it is perfectly clear that if there is no time limit on the obligations of the Government under the act of 1877, and this has been fully discussed, then there is an existing obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to make those appropriations to which the point of order relates. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a motion in respect to the paragraph as to which the point of order has been overruled. If we pass that now, I presume I would lose the right of making that motion, and I desire to be recognized now to offer an amendment in respect to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I notice the language in the paragraph that has just been under discussion is:

For support of Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he can inform the committee whether any of the funds herein provided for are ever used to take care of the Sioux who remain across the border of South Dakota in Minnesota who are members of the Santee Sioux.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think not. Do I understand that this item is now open for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Certainly it is.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Very well; let the gentleman offer his amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by inserting, after the word "Nebraska," in line 20, page 26, the word "Minnesota."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon that, or, if the gentleman desires it, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words to the committee in respect to those Indians, who are the brothers of the Santee Sioux, remaining in Minnesota, and I will take only a moment or two. About a year ago I received information that those Indians, who have now no tribal relations and no property rights, their treaty rights having been declared null and void by the act of Congress of 1863, are, and for some time have been, in exceedingly destitute circumstances. They do not live anywhere near where I do, but many hundreds of miles away. I understand they are without land. They make such precarious living as they can make by doing a little trapping in the wintertime and working about in the summer time. Last year, and in the years previous to that, they made somewhat of a living by catching frogs for the Twin City market, but that now they have lost, by reason of the change in climatic and topographic conditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If they are Sioux Indians, are they now covered by the language of the paragraph?

Mr. MILLER. I am inclined to think so, but I do not think the department has ever taken care of them, and I want to make it certain.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will note that there are two parts of that paragraph. One relates to the Santee Sioux Indians, which is a treaty obligation pure and simple under a special treaty, and the other paragraph relates to the Sioux Indians generally, excepting certain tribes that are specifically mentioned, and there is an appropriation of $200,000 for subsistence.

Mr. MILLER. I thought by inserting the word "Minnesota" it would make it definite.

Mr. MANN. And inserting the word where the gentleman proposes would not affect the appropriation of $200,000 for subsistence.

Mr. MILLER. The Sioux I am speaking of are a part of the Santee band. The term "Santee Sioux" is not a scientifically accurate description. It has been applied to those Sioux and their bands to whom they are related who participated in the Sioux massacre in 1862 in Minnesota, most of whom were subsequently moved to Nebraska.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman state the name of the band that he has in mind?

Mr. MILLER. It is not named. They are those Indians who remained in Minnesota who were not transferred to Nebraska at the conclusion of the Sioux outbreak in 1862.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think this language would confine it to any State, but to the Sioux Indians of the United States.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, to save time I make the point of order. I think the gentleman from Minnesota will concede it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They are outlaw Indians, and they are not a party to the treaty of 1868 or the treaty of 1877.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman on that. The only basis upon which it has ever been claimed by the department that they are not entitled to immediate recognition by the passage of an act of Congress is that they were bound as parties to the treaty of 1880.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the reason I have consented to report a bill on one or two occasions for their relief was upon the theory that they were not a party to that treaty.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think they were, but they are getting it both coming and going, and they are in a very unfortunate situation. They are Indians most of whom rendered the whites very important service at the time of that unfortunate outbreak. They had their property taken from them by legislative action, and now they are destitute and suffering. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. In line 3, page 27, was the word "river" inserted after the word "Cheyenne" by unanimous consent?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; it was inserted on Tuesday.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If there is any doubt about that, I would suggest that that amendment be now made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands from information at the desk that it was inserted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. There is no authorization of law for the appropriation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman, so far as I am concerned, to make the point of order, and then we can discuss it if it is desired. I do not care to discuss further the merits of the proposition except I want to say to the gentleman that in the last few minutes I have received this information from the Indian Office: Since the act of 1889 there has been expended under that act for the Sioux $6,834,000 for all purposes. That does not include the moneys that have been appropriated under the treaty of 1877, but it does include this $3,000,000 trust fund, and on December 31 the account had been credited with $5,332,000, and not a dollar paid to the Indians.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, upon the point of order I think clearly that it is not well taken. The provision of the treaty of 1877, section 5—the one commented upon by the Chair in rendering the decision—is the educational provision. It provides that the United States shall furnish all necessary aid to civilization, including industrial and mechanical schools, as provided in the treaty of 1868. I knew that these lines, from 10 to 16, on page 27 of the bill, had been read at the time I addressed the Chair upon the former point of order, and my entire remarks were addressed to the educational clause of section 5, which the Chair commented upon. I think the obligation there is clearly to continue the educational facilities indefinitely. They were in force for 20 years by the treaty of 1868, and 12 years of that was still running when this treaty was made. And one of the considerations of that treaty of 1876–77, the one, indeed, as enumerated in the treaty of 1875, is the aids to civilization and the maintenance of mechanical and industrial schools. I think that obligation is clearly on the Government, and I think that is entirely covered by the ruling already made on the other point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] had not really made the point of order, and I suggested that he make the point of order, and then I assumed he would discuss it, when I wanted to reply to him. And that was the reason I sat down without discussing the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I do make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, because there is no legislation for it, and, not only that, in the hearings, on page 347, of last year, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] admits it is a treaty, and admits the treaty expenditure in 1909, and because the Chair has during the consideration of this very bill ruled out an item which was a gratuity, and admits the treaty expenditure in 1909, and because the Chair has during the consideration of this very bill ruled out an item which was a gratuity for schools, certainly this is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will not be affected in his decision, and I apprehend he will not be, by what I may have conceded a year ago as to this being a gratuity. I am frank to admit that at the time I was laboring under the impression that it was a gratuity, and that I did not consider the provisions of the treaty of 1877 went as far as they do, and as the Chair has held. Now, we make every year an appropriation for the education of Indians of $1,420,000, and I want to call the attention of the Chair to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 4205, because I think it ought to be in this debate as to the extent to which we may go in appropriations for the support and education, and so forth, of Indians. Section 4205 says:

> The Committee on Indian Affairs has a broad jurisdiction of subjects relating to the care, education, and management of the Indians, including the care and allotment of their lands.

And then it goes on to state:

> On December 6, 1888, the resolutions distributing the President's message used this language relating to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, giving to that committee so much "as relates to the care, education, and management of the Indians." This language has been used for a long time in these resolutions; and the committee has exercised a broad jurisdiction as to the care of Indians on the reservations, and in Indian Territory while that reserve existed as a separate territory, and also as to the care and preservation of Indian lands and the allotment in severalty.

Now, I think, we are justified under that in making appropriations for education, even if they are not specifically authorized. And in this instance the treaty of 1877 clearly includes the education as part of the civilization, and I think the Chair in his ruling referred to education in connection with the language in that part of the agreement,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, for my part, I believe I would be glad if the Chair would find that, under the law, he could sustain the point of order. The item is:

For the support and maintenance of day and industrial schools among the Sioux Indians.

One of the first items in the bill is:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools not otherwise provided for and for other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, $1,420,000.

All through the bill there are items carrying appropriations for the maintenance and support of schools and pupils in schools.

The item to which I have referred, of $1,420,000, is not under any treaty obligation, it is not to carry out any agreement that the Government has with the Indians, but it is sustained so far on the broad power that the Indians are wards of the Government, and that, under the policy which the Government has maintained, it has the right to appropriate money for their education and for industrial schools.

Two or three years ago I made a point of order against the Florida item, which was for the support and maintenance, I believe, of Florida Indians. I thought at that time that that item was subject to a point of order. Whoever was in the chair at that time, after an examination of the general statutes in regard to the Indians under the control of the United States, held that it was within the power of the Government, if authorized by law, to make an appropriation for their support, maintenance, and civilization. If, however, the Chair can find a way to rule that the Government is not authorized under existing law to maintain these industrial schools and these day schools, as well as the colleges scattered throughout the country called Indian schools, I hope the Chair will take the opportunity to say that there is no authorization of law for this purpose, because, undoubtedly, it would result in the saving of millions of dollars a year which the Government now expends for useless Indian schools.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] desire to be heard?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I did not want to more than suggest that this is the normal situation: The paragraph is brought in with the specific provision that the treaty is continued another year. A point of order is made, and the point of order is conceded.

The gentleman then immediately reoffered that part of the paragraph, save and except the authority which he admits he did not have.

Now, can the Chair be asked to find that a portion of this paragraph was in order when the other part, which was the very foundation upon which the whole paragraph stands, has been conceded to be out of order, and even has been withdrawn?

I do not care, Mr. Chairman, to pursue it further.

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling on the point of order the Chair will cite the first portion of article 5 of the act of 1877 which is as follows:—

ART. 5. In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights, and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

If the Chair is correct in thinking that the reference in this section, to the act of 1868—and he has, heretofore, endeavored to give somewhat in extenso the reasons for the following conclusion—merely means to say that the details of the aid, education and instruction which the United States undertakes to afford, are set out in the act of 1868, and those details without tedious repetition are made a part of the latter agreement, just as a later deed without formal recital, refers to and adopts the descriptive matter of a prior conveyance, then, of course, there is no time limit upon the obligations assumed in the act of 1877.

If there is no time limit upon these obligations, then they are obligations of a continuing character. Hence this paragraph affords ample authority for an appropriation for the support of day and industrial schools for the Sioux Indians.

The treaty specifically declares, in the section just read to the committee, that the United States will provide all necessary aid to furnish these Indians with schools, and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts.

If authority for these schools, may be found in the paragraph cited, and it is so found, then there is authority for the amendment, and the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding at the end of the amendment, "reimbursable from any funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to said Indians."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment to the amendment. If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] does not wish to discuss the merits, I will make the point of order. Of course, I will be guided by what he desires.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the Chair can rule.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. I will state that the Chair has just held that it is in order under the treaty of 1877 to include this item. It is an obligation of the Government, and therefore it would violate existing law when it is proposed to make an amendment carried in the item reimbursable from any funds in the Treasury belonging to these Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. But it makes a reduction of the expense to the Government, so that the Holman rule becomes operative. As to the propriety of it, the Chair does not say.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I did not suppose that the Holman rule would go so far as to relieve the Government of an obligation that it had contracted to fulfill under an agreement or treaty made with a tribe of Indians, and I doubt if it goes to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that that is a question of propriety put up to the House for its action, not a question of parliamentary ruling. The House can do a thing that may be improper. Without undertaking to make that criticism of this particular proceeding, the Chair will say that the House is competent to do it. The Chair is merely commenting on the parliamentary status of it. The Chair would think that that amendment would be in order. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard a moment on the merits of this proposition. Here is a conceded obligation of the Government to furnish these educational facilities to these Indians, for which they have given ample consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that part of the amendment does not touch the treaty at all—no part of it. It stops with the words, "two hundred thousand dollars." This is an amendment to support the day and industrial schools amongst the Sioux Indians, and so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes; but the Chair has very properly held, within a few moments, that the treaty obligations of the Government of the United States, under the treaty of 1876 confirmed by the act of 1877, require that there should be provided these educational facilities for these Indians which this appropriation of $200,000 will cover. Therefore the obligation is upon the Government to make the appropriation.

Now, then, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], not being able to raise a point of order against the item, because it is in order, because it is based upon a contractual obligation of the Government, proposes by an appeal to numbers, if it can be done, to vote away the Government's obligation to keep its treaties and to take the money of our wards and reimburse ourselves for keeping our treaty obligations, and undoubtedly create a claim in the Court of Claims on the part of these Indians, to be litigated and eventually reimbursed. I appeal to the good sense as well as the sense of fairness of the members of this committee not to be led into any such ridiculous attitude by the extremity of the gentleman from Oklahoma in a parliamentary situation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman, I know, is aware that I am disposed to be fair to the Indians of South Dakota as well as those of Oklahoma, and no one regrets more than I do that this controversy has arisen between the two States. Unfortunately in reporting the bill, as the chairman of the committee, I was placed in the peculiar attitude of opposing this appropriation, and I now think and believe that the appropriation both for the schools of Oklahoma and those of South Dakota should have remained in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I apprehend, then, upon this vote the gentleman will support us.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think the contentions of the gentleman from South Dakota are correct.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In other words, the gentleman thinks two wrongs will make one right.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think so at all, but I believe the statement made in this document, 209, Indian schools and agencies, 1912, will convince the gentleman that a great injustice has been done Oklahoma. I find that the State of Oklahoma, with 17,250 children, has $2,241,248 worth of school property. That is $13 per capita. I find that the gentleman's State of South Dakota has $314 per capita of school funds and school property. The difference, then, between the way Oklahoma is treated and the way South Dakota is treated is as 13 is to 314. I notice that the gentleman and that side of the House were very swift to strike from this bill everything that could be stricken from it in aid of this $13 per capita for Oklahoma and to prevent anything being taken from the $314 for South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman does me an injustice. At least whether it be an injustice or not, he is mistaken. I was not present when the Oklahoma item was stricken out. I did not know it was stricken out until after I came to the House this morning.

Mr. MANN. This side of the House had nothing to do with it, except that I made the point of order on my own responsibility, and will continue to make a great many more before the gentleman is through with the Indian appropriation bill, nor will I be deterred by threats of this kind.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman point out what threat I have made just now?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to retaliate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I propose to see that justice is done between the different sections of this country.

Mr. MANN. I will continue to make points of order against any and every paragraph in the gentleman's bill whenever I deem it proper to do so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not be in a position to do that.

Mr. MANN. But I shall be. I shall be here. The gentleman need not worry about that. I shall be right here.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who has always been extremely fair and courteous to me, both when he was a member of the minority and since he has been chairman of the committee, that he seems to involve me in the matter of the elimination from the bill of an item of appropriation for schools in Oklahoma, when I had absolutely nothing whatever to do with it at all. I did not make any point of order. I never said one solitary word on the subject. Now, if the gentleman rises in his place and makes a point of order and the Chair sustains the point of order, there ought not to be any disposition on the part of the committee to do something that is contrary to what I perhaps am standing for. I am not responsible for the point of order nor for the action of the Chair in sustaining it. I want to say that I never take exception to any Member making a point of order. He has that privilege, and in the exercise of his rights as a Member on this floor, if he believes that an item ought not to be in the bill because it is not authorized by law, and he makes a point of order against it, I am fair enough to say that I believe he is actuated by honest motives, and that he is simply carrying out what his conscience dictates, and I never have acted and never will act in retaliation because a point of order was made against an item that I was interested in. In the present instance the point of order was made by somebody else.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I thought the gentleman from Texas had the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman think it is just and right that Oklahoma should have only $13 per capita in school property, while the gentleman's State has $314?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not see what bearing that has upon the question, how much Oklahoma has or how much Montana has.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If you have $314, as stated here, should it not be reimbursable, when you have $41,000,000 of property in your State to reimburse it from?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I may say that the committee is furnishing a spectacle of something new to me in my experience in the brief time I have been here. I do not think I have ever before seen a committee come into the House and attempt to make points of order against their own bill. That is unusual, but it seems, from what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has just said, that it is done because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has the habit of making points of order pretty frequently, made a point of order against an item in the bill and the point of order was sustained by the Chair. Now, when any item is reached that a member of the minority of the committee happens to be interested in, because it is in his State, the attitude of the majority is to try to eliminate it. I do not believe that is fair, and it has been my opinion that there has been some feeling indulged in here. Certainly there has been none on my part. I have no feeling whatever.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman can not say that I have any feeling.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman has been neutral, but as chairman of the committee I think he ought to stand up and defend his bill rather than assist in assaults that are being made upon it from either side of the House. One of the functions of the chairman of a committee ordinarily is to come in and maintain the bill which his committee has reported and which he has helped to frame and not to assail it on the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on that side insist that these funds ought to be reimbursable when the Indians have large funds in the Treasury. Here are $41,000,000 in the Treasury for the use of only 20,000 Indians, while they have $348 per capita of school property and of money that is going to them annually for these purposes for each child.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Oklahoma has only $35 of school property and of money that can be annually expended.

The CHAIRMAN. All this is to be understood as coming out of the time of the gentleman from South Dakota, and his time has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Now, we are brought to this absurd proposition: The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the chairman of this great Committee on Indian Affairs, has not only intimated but he has stated that he proposed to oppose an item that he helped to put into this bill, in cooperation with the other members of the committee, which item the Chairman of this Committee of the Whole has held here in the last 20 minutes is to be maintained under treaty obligations. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs proposes to lend himself by his vote and his influence to defeat that item because, forsooth, some days ago, when I did not have the fortune to be in the room, although he has accused me of being connected with it, another item for the State of Oklahoma was objected to and a point of order made against it by the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and went out upon a point of order, from which we may assume that there was no legal basis for maintaining it in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that this amendment is no part of the bill reported to the House?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The amendment is the precise section of the bill, except that it leaves off certain language which was subject to a point of order. The item is a proper item.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It makes this item reimbursable.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It was not reimbursable, and we can not make it reimbursable because it is based on treaty obligations, which would create a liability in the Court of Claims.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought not to be led into this absurd position. I understood that the item with reference to Oklahoma that went out the other day was a provision for common schools. I have understood that a great many white children attended these common schools. I know nothing about that item or its merits, but I do know that this particular item is to maintain the Indian schools inside the Indian reservations, and I know that the Sioux Indians paid for it in one of the most valuable properties on the continent; that it has yielded $150,000,000 in gold up to date and yields about $10,000,000 every year. I know that the Government of the United States can not escape paying for it by the action of certain gentlemen who are getting restless on account of another item going out of the bill, and I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, should lend his aid to it because another item that did not have a point to stand upon is not in his bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman asked the question how many white people are interested in the schools, and I will say to the gentleman that on the eastern side of Oklahoma the Indian gets 85 cents for each child, a magnificent sum, while in the State of South Dakota you have three schools with several hundred Indians, and they get the magnificent sum of $167 per capita, and that is the advantage of living in South Dakota rather than in Oklahoma.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Well, there are other advantages, I hope. I do know that this advantage, whatever it is, has been paid for by these Indians, and that they are entitled to realize upon it. I know by a personal visitation to these schools that they are Indian schools—industrial, mechanical schools—and that the benefits are going exclusively to the Indian children. I know of no white children that attend these schools.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the gentleman who offered the amendment will not press it, or if he feels for any reason that he must, I hope that the amendment will not prevail. It looks to me as if this is one of the most unfortunate quibbles that has come to us in handling the Indian question for a long time.

We are now dealing with the simple question of fulfilling the treaty obligations with the Sioux Indians. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether we should have $200,000 for this purpose or whether we should have $100,000 or $50,000 or $500,000. As to the exact amount needed I have no information and I profess none, but I do know, Mr. Chairman, that whatever amount we put in this item, if we make it reimbursable we have created a claim in behalf of these Indians against the Government of the United States. I do know that we have repudiated a solemn, sacred obligation, and have done it in broad daylight; we have done it after the most full discussion, and it has been done by men who ought to stand here and champion the Indian cause wherever found rather than to stand here and urge upon Congress provisions whereby the Government breaks its obligations. A broken obligation means a claim; a claim means lobbyists and lawyers and the scandals that follow.

This Government to-day is face to face with many of the deeds of the past that were wrong, some of which we are trying to right. Now, for God's sake, do not write another chapter of the same kind. Cut it down if it must be, raise it if it must be, but do it right; do it as the treaty said it should be done, and stand up and face it as it should be faced.

I can readily see, Mr. Chairman, if this is taken as a precedent, if we are to let the difficulties of the present moment—some of the animosities created by the little debate during the last three or four days—get control of the Indian legislation, for the next six months or a year great wrong will be done, not to urselves, because we can not hurt ourselves, but to the Indians, whose guardians we are and who are helpless wards of ours. They are the ones to suffer.

Now, it does seem to me that this is more like boys' play than it is like the conduct of dignified men on an important subject.

As I understand, it all arose because of the knocking off of one paragraph in the bill relating to Oklahoma. The gentlemen of the committee know, I suppose, without any question, that I myself thought that that was subject to a point of order, but I never thought of making it. I would vote for it if it came in now, and I will tell you why: Because I know that before this bill becomes a law it will be a part of it, and I would like to have the gentlemen who represent Oklahoma in this House get credit for it, if there is any credit in the act, before the people of their State.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is it claimed, in reference to the Oklahoma item, with which I have no familiarity, that it is in the bill by virtue of a treaty obligation?

Mr. MILLER. No; it has no foundation in law. It has nothing to justify it. It is a pure gratuity, a pure gift, and one that is rather unfortunate, because it is giving something to the common schools of the State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I myself have been a little emphatic—perhaps too emphatic—but I appeal to the good common sense of that side of the aisle that they will let this question before us be considered in a fair and impartial manner. It is about time that we ended the bickering back and forth across the aisle. Gentlemen across the aisle know that there are important matters now pending in which they and their people are deeply interested, and I do not believe that they want to start a fight all along the line.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the seeming unfairness of the remarks of gentlemen, I would not say anything at this time. This is an anomalous situation that prevails in reference to this paragraph. The Indian Office during the preparation of this bill undoubtedly recognized fully that the treaty expired in 1909, and they drew the paragraph explicitly extending it for another year, as it has been done annually since the treaty formally expired. I shall not stop there; I will take the testimony of the gentleman from South Dakota, who was for many years chairman of the committee. The gentleman from South Dakota knows more than any other man here about Indian affairs in Dakota, and I will read his words, to which I am indebted to him for calling my attention. I will read from the hearings (page 347) of last year, when this precise item was under consideration. Here is the language:

Mr. BURKE. For the information of Mr. FERRIS I will say that the appropriation for the support of schools among the Sioux has always been carried in a separate item in this part of the bill, because under the treaty of 1889 we were obligated to pay for the education of the Sioux, and that treaty expired, as I recall, in 1909. We have been making the appropriation since by extending the treaty, if you will notice by that language, and it really is a gratuity, the same as the education of other Indians. This is to pay the expenses of the reservation schools generally. There are 20,000 Indians there, and instead of paying it out of the fund that is over further in the early part of the bill, it has been kept here, and I merely make this explanation so you may understand why this item is here.

Commissioner VALENTINE. It would be an item to add to the $1,400,000 if it were not here in this part of the bill.

Mr. BURKE. There is another reason why I prefer to have it that way. I have to come in contact with my Indians as you do with yours, Mr. FERRIS. They complain about things that we do. I call their attention to certain things. For instance, in this case I say to them, "We are giving you $220,000 that we did not agree to give to you and that we do not have to give to you. It shows that the Government is generous.

Mr. FERRIS. The treaty expired in 1909?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; it was a 20-year treaty.

Mr. FERRIS. And, of course, now it is a gratuity.

Mr. BURKE. It is a gratuity.

Mr. Chairman, certainly what chastisement I have had, what chastisement the chairman has had, as to the proposition that we are here fighting an item that we are bound to support by treaty, must, of necessity, be exploded. That reverts to the original question of whether or not they should pay this from their own funds. I care nothing about the "animosity" talked about back and forth. There is no "animosity" so far as I am concerned. I want to call attention to the fact that I think these Indians are more than well to do. They are worth $41,000,000 in property, and here is the report that gives their property. They have $3,000,000 and over of cash in the Treasury.

The treaty expired in 1909 by the words of the commissioner, by the words of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], and by the words of the law itself. If there be anything about the theory that we shall have the Indians pay where they are able to pay, my amendment should be adopted. If there is nothing about the theory that the Indians should pay when they have money to pay, my amendment should be defeated. Every item in the State of Oklahoma, except one, so far as the Five Civilized Tribes are concerned, for schools is paid for out of the Indian money. No item in this State of South Dakota, either for agency or for schools, is paid out of the Indian money, but in each case it is paid out of the Federal Treasury. There are 20,000 Indians in South Dakota, and they are worth $41,000,000, and they do not pay one penny for the service that is rendered them in the schools and in the various agencies. There are 10,000 Indians of the Five Tribes in Oklahoma, and they have $6,000,000 in the Treasury, and they pay every cent of their school expense. I merely ask that as to this one item this House vote to let the Indians pay where they are able to pay, as they do in other States. I do not know what the vote on this amendment may be. Personally I care not. I merely want to call it to the attention of the House, and the House can do what it sees fit.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak briefly in response to what the gentleman from Oklahoma has stated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be used on each side.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we must get through with this bill to-day, and I think we had better stay here to-day until the bill is finished.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I want 5 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Make it 15 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I ask unanimous consent that all debate close in 15 minutes, 10 minutes to be consumed on that side and 5 minutes on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that at the end of 15 minutes, 10 minutes of which to be used by the minority side of the House and 5 by the majority side of the House, debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto shall cease. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] read from the hearings of last year wherein I stated that this appropriation was a gratuity. I presume he read it for the benefit of a Member or of Members who might be in the committee now who were not present when I read the same thing a short time ago. I read all of that that the gentleman from Oklahoma read. It is true that when this item was being considered in the committee a year ago I did state that it was a gratuity. I had in mind only the obligation of the 1889 treaty, which was limited in its provisions to 20 years. I did not consider at that time the obligation of the Government to provide education in connection with the civilization of these Indians, and since that time I have done so; and I have argued here to-day to the able chairman, who has only recently rendered a decision in which he holds it is not a gratuity. If the gentleman from South Dakota did state in 1911, at some time or at some place or somewhere, that it was a gratuity, that does not overrule the decision of the very able lawyer who fortunately presides over these deliberations upon this occasion. It does not overrule the law, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] very aptly suggests to me. I appreciate the high compliment paid me by the gentleman from Oklahoma, overlooking the sarcasm, but I am free to say that I appreciate that I am not entitled to any such encomium as the gentleman gives me, because I do not know all about Indian affairs, and there is a great deal more that I do not know than there is that I do know about the subject. I am not priding myself on having extraordinary knowledge on the subject of Indian legislation, but I know what the situation is at the present time, namely, that the chairman has held that this is a treaty obligation, and when I made a point of order against the amendment which proposes to make it reimbursable the Chair overruled the point of order upon the ground that it reduces the expenditure from the Federal Treasury under the Holman rule, and was not subject to the point of order. I appeal to members of the committee upon both sides of the Chamber that we ought not violate a sacred obligation that we have entered into with these Indians, to appropriate money for education and make it reimbursable when it is a violation of the treaty obligations.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman really, honestly in his heart think that treaty is still in full force and effect?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do.

Mr. FERRIS. Then the gentleman believes to-day what he knows last year was not so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have frankly stated what I said at that time, and it does not matter what I stated. That does not change the law. It does not change the ruling made by the Chairman. I appeal to gentlemen on that side of the Chamber that we ought not, because we have the power, by reason of force of numbers, and because we have a rule called the Holman rule, which permits amendments which otherwise would not be in order, to do a wrong and reimburse or make reimbursable against the Indians money that we have contracted by treaty to expend for them. Whenever we do that we furnish the foundation for a claim against the Government, and, heaven knows, we have had enough scandal in connection with Indian claims in the amounts that have been paid in attorneys' fees to these lobbyists who hang around this Capitol digging up anything that they can find wherein a treaty obligation may have been technically violated, so that they may bring in a claim against the Government.

And I hope that that side of the House will not, as I have already stated, vote to make reimbursable this appropriation in the face of our obligation that we will expend it from the Public Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair a moment ago was called upon to make a ruling upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and held that it was in order under the Holman rule. I have no criticism to make of the Chair or the ruling under the circumstances. It was made without argument. I do not think, and I wish to put my statement on record, that it was in order under the Holman rule. That rule provides that a matter shall be in order which shall retrench expenditures by the reduction in salary of the officers of the Government, which is not this case. Second, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, which is not this case. Third, by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill, which is not this case, because there is change in the amount of money either covered by the bill or offered by the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a moment ago we were met by a very frank avowal by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has the pending bill in charge. He stated to the House frankly and honestly that because I had made a point of order against one or two items—I made a point of order against two, but I do not know whether he included both—in the bill, where Oklahoma was interested, that, therefore, the point of order having been sustained by the Chair, gentlemen on that side of the House proposed to retaliate by striking out——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I deny the statement. It is untrue.

Mr. MANN. It is not untrue. That was the gentleman's statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Let it go in the RECORD. We will see who is right.

Mr. MANN. By striking out an item in which the senior Republican member of that committee is interested. I will ask the gentleman frankly what his statement was, then?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The RECORD will show. It will show that you have not stated it correctly.

Mr. MANN. I have stated it correctly. If the gentleman does not change the RECORD, and I will see he does not——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman insinuate that I would change the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. I did not say so. I have seen the gentleman change the RECORD before——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do you mean that I have changed the RECORD here? If you do, it is untrue and false.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean to insinuate anything. The gentleman is requiring a good deal of patience, not only on my part but on the part of the whole House, in the conduct of the Indian appropriation bill. The gentleman stated, and it will so appear in the RECORD, that because items had been stricken out relating to Oklahoma therefore he proposed to vote to strike out an item relating to South Dakota. In effect, that was his statement. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order. I am responsible for it. I never have made a point of order in this House on items in appropriation bills which had anything to do with politics. I do not make points of order against items in which Members are interested because they are Republicans or because they are Democrats. But if the Democratic House concludes that because a gentleman on the Republican side of the House makes a point of order in which a Democratic Member is interested, and which is sustained, therefore they will retaliate by striking out an item in which a Republican Member is interested, it will be drawing the line where no favors will be asked and no favors will be granted. Gentlemen on both sides of this aisle know perfectly well that the amenities between gentlemen are preserved in the House regardless of politics, and it is the first time I ever have heard in the House of Representatives during my service here, the chairman of a great appropriation committee declaring that he proposed to punish one of the minority because another Member of the minority had had stricken out of the bill on a point of order, sustained by the Chair, an item in which a Member of the majority was interested.

But if it is a matter of favors and retaliation, commence. We will be there when it is going on.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I desire to state that I did not use the word "punish," and did not intend to so use it, and the gentleman knows it very well.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an inquiry. I am quite anxious to do nothing wrong, either under pressure or without pressure, and I do not think I have. But let me inquire of the Chair, if I may now, if the Chair at this time is of the opinion that this treaty is still in full force and effect, and I ought not to offer my amendment? I can not help but believe that when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs thinks the treaty expired in 1899—and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] thought so then, and I think so now—I was justified in offering the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute? Is it possible the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who might not have looked up the law, could make a wrong statement, not knowing the facts?

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly, that is true.

Mr. MADDEN. And is it not infinitely better to rely on the chairman, who has looked up the law, and let us quit this bickering?

Mr. FERRIS. In response to the gentleman, I will say that it is entirely correct; but I am not sure that the long deliberation of the Committee on Indian Affairs in making up this bill and the unusual ability of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], the former chairman of the committee, should be overlooked.

Mr. CARTER. I would like for the RECORD to read that this comes in my time. I wish to get in on this proposition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I thought the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] made an inquiry.

Mr. FERRIS. I did. Does the Chair, in face of the law now before him, and in face of the bill, think this treaty is in full force and effect, and does he think the Federal Government is obligated to make this appropriation under this treaty out of the Government funds?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, as to the first inquiry, as to whether the agreement of 1877 furnishes authority to make this appropriation, the Chair is not in doubt. There can be no reasonable question of the obligation of the United States under that agreement. Of course this conclusion is merely the best judgment of the Chair upon the statutes before him, and with the opportunity that has been afforded for investigation. In the construction of contracts between parties who are not on an equal footing, some account should be taken of that fact. In this instance the United States was dealing with savages, and must be regarded as having an advantage over them. The Government was dealing with its wards. So that, in construing any portion of that agreement, if a question of doubt arises, that doubt must be resolved by an interpretation most favorable to the weaker party. This principle is very clear.

Mr. FERRIS. If the Chair will pardon me, I would like to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in the act of passing to the next proposition. We find a reference in one act to an antecedent treaty. This reference is susceptible, it is suggested, to two meanings. The Chair does not think it is really susceptible to more than one, but the Chair can understand that in the judgment of others this language may be charged with another meaning. One interpretation is in favor of the Indians because it continues indefinitely an obligation assumed by the Government. The other is against the Indians because it imposes a time limitation upon the discharge of this obligation.

Now applying the principle of favorable interpretation for the weaker party, the Chair is very clearly of the opinion that the reference to the antecedent act was not intended to prescribe a short-time limitation for the discharge of the obligation of the Government.

In this connection it must be borne in mind, as a further ground for holding that no limitation was intended, that additional valuable consideration was afforded by the Indians under the agreement of 1877. This fact furnishes an additional cogent reason for concluding that the United States was required to furnish additional valuable consideration on its part. The Chair therefore has no difficulty in concluding that in consideration of the territory ceded, the United States agreed to extend its undertaking to assist the Indians in the work of civilization, and that this obligation is in full force.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a further inquiry. At the time of the passage of the act of 1877 the act of 1868 had not expired by 11 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it had not expired. The Chair will not be certain as to the precise time.

Mr. FOWLER. It was made on February 29, 1868, with a limitation of 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Then in 1877 an agreement was made between the two contracting parties, as the Chair has detailed, the United States on one side and the Sioux Indians on the other, in which the Black Hills property was involved.

The CHAIRMAN. In which a valuable consideration moved from the Indians to the Government.

Mr. FOWLER. I concede the force of the argument of the Chair, but in 1889, on the 2d day of March, as I recollect, the treaty of 1868 was extended for another 20 years. May I inquire of the Chair as to what he thinks the object of Congress was in extending the treaty of 1868 if the act of 1877 was intended to be perpetual?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can hardly answer that as a question of parliamentary law. The Chair will say that that same act to which the gentleman refers expressly provides that everything in the act of 1877, anything in the act of 1889 to the contrary notwithstanding, should be perpetuated, and it gave it a new life, so to speak.

Mr. FOWLER. It was limited, as the Chair well knows, to a period of 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to do the best he can with the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FOWLER. But I am anxious to know what effect the Chair thinks the act of Congress had upon this situation by extending the period 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. That phase of the situation the Chair has not considered at all, and the Chair is not undertaking to rule on that. This is a matter of a good deal of importance, and the Chair is simply trying to do the best he can toward the solution of a parliamentary proposition which involves some legal principles. It seems to the Chair that the simplest way to get a final solution of it—and a far more authoritative one than the Chair can give—is to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair and let the committee itself settle it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the matter be passed over until the Chair can have time to look up the authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair fully examined into this matter and explained the different steps in the transaction. Into that particular phase referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], which is not before the committee, the Chair has not examined.

Mr. CULLOP. It was in view of that that I made the suggestion which I have just offered.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, can I be recognized for five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes, in view of what has happened.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, there seems to have arisen a mistaken impression about the procedure in the House to-day. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] certainly misunderstood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]. What I understood the gentleman from Texas to say was that he favored this amendment because it tended to equalize the school benefits that were being derived by the two States. If I was mistaken in that, I ask that the gentleman from Texas correct me. There seems also to be a general mistake about certain gentlemen on this side of the House taking umbrage at the action of the gentleman from Illinois for exercising his privilege in making a point of order against the provision of $300,000 for the schools of the State of Oklahoma. Let me assure the gentleman there is no soreness on this side. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], it is true, was very much interested in that item. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] was also interested in the item. But I think that was, in a sense, considered my item, since most of the funds would be spent in the districts represented by my colleague from Oklahoma, Mr. DAVENPORT, and myself.

So if anyone should take umbrage at the gentleman from Illinois it would certainly be one of us. I insisted that the matter go in the bill when it was under consideration in the committee, and by the assistance of my colleague, Mr. FERRIS, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] it did go in; but while we regret the loss of this relief to our State, no one takes any offense at the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and no ill feelings are cherished against him for exercising his privilege as a Member of the House in objecting to this item.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this amendment under consideration now because, as has been stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], it tends to equalize the benefits that are being derived by two States, which difference should be adjusted as equally as possible. You all heard the statement of the gentleman to the effect that the State of South Dakota has $314 school privileges per Indian and the State of Oklahoma only $13 per capita Indian population.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman from Texas will correct the gentleman from Oklahoma. He did not make that statement.

Mr. CARTER. That was my understanding.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Per capita of Indian children.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman was only referring to three nonreservation schools.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will examine the document from which I read, he will find that it includes the value of all the school property, and you must remember——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is not the point that the gentleman stated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You must remember that you have a number of schools there.

Mr. CARTER. I intended to quote, as nearly as possible, the statement of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Perhaps I did not understand it.

Mr. CARTER. I intended to state that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] had stated in his remarks that the State of South Dakota had already $314 per capita in school benefits, improvements, or whatever you might call them, and that the State of Oklahoma had only $13. That was my understanding of the statement of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman to say that we have in school property for the benefit of South Dakota $314 for each Indian?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For each Indian reported by this report.

Mr. CARTER. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I confess that I do not understand the proposition.

Mr. CARTER. The proposition is just what the gentleman from South Dakota stated it, exactly.

Mr. MANN. We have several million dollars' worth of property in my State for each Indian. How does that affect the question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not understand what the point is that the gentleman is trying to make. The property in the Five Civilized Tribes is certainly greater in value than all the property of the Indians in South Dakota three or four times over.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the school population, and the school population is given in South Dakota and also in Oklahoma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Indian school population?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Indian school population, Indians in school. Then, estimating the school property, schoolhouses and plants, that they have, it gives Oklahoma $13 per capita and South Dakota $314.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not understand what the gentleman's point is.

Mr. CARTER. Did I understand the gentleman to say $31 or $13?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Thirteen dollars.

Mr. CARTER. I understood the gentleman to give the figure at $13 in his first statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Per capita of the Indians in school.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman stated that South Dakota has Indian school property, for Indians, $314 per capita Indian population, and Oklahoma only $13.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Where did the gentleman get any such statement?

Mr. CARTER. From the statement of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think the gentleman from Texas will make that statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to explain how that is? There are, I think, three schools in the State, and they have very valuable plants. You have several hundred Indians attending those schools, and the estimate is about $167 per capita for each of those Indians. Oklahoma has only one school. Oklahoma has 120,000 Indians. In South Dakota you have only 20,000 Indians. Oklahoma has about six times as many Indians as South Dakota. That is the difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment because I thought the treaty expired in 1909. I offered it because I thought that was the judgment of the commissioner and because, in the hearings of 1911, on page 347, the gentleman from South Dakota said it is a gratuity and admits that the treaty expired in 1909. Now, if the judgment of the Chair is that that treaty has not expired, I do not desire to take the responsibility of offering an amendment to make them pay out of their funds in the face of a treaty, and so far as I am concerned I withdraw the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence and civilization of the Yankton Sioux, South Dakota, $14,000.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 18, page 26, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to return to line 18, page 26, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I should like to say to the gentleman that, as I have already explained, I was out of the Chamber when that paragraph was read the other day, being out of the city. If he desires to object under those circumstances——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I did not catch the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I say I was unavoidably away from the city when this item was read. I do not desire to take up time unnecessarily, but I apprehend the gentleman does not understand the matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the object of the gentleman?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I want to offer an amendment to increase the item for general repairs and improvements to the Indian school at Rapid City, S. Dak., from $5,000 to $9,000, in accordance with the recommendation of the bureau.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman will not find in this bill any allowance for new improvements, and we can not afford to single out this one school.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has perhaps overlooked the fact that the justification for this increase is stated by the commissioner to be as follows:

There will also be needed about $9,000 for the general repairs and improvements to the buildings and grounds. This is a very conservative estimate for this purpose.

I have found nothing in the hearings to indicate that any new or other information had come before the committee, and I know personally that this appropriation is needed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not agree to go back for that purpose, when we have uniformly refused to allow such items as that.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one physician for Indians under the superintendent of the Shivwitz School, Utah, $500.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman from Kansas will pardon me, I desire to dispose of another matter with reference to New Mexico, and then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma motion.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10, line 17, to insert a new paragraph by way of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to page 10 to insert a new paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of a bridge across the Gila River on the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., $45,500, and for the construction of a bridge across the San Carlos River on said reservation in said State, $19,800, to be immediately available, said bridges to be constructed across said streams in the places and manner recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in House Document No. 1013, Sixty-second Congress, third session; in all, $65,300, which said sum of $65,300, with interest thereon at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, shall be reimbursed to the United States by the Apache Indians having tribal rights on the Fort Apache and San Carlos Indian Reservations, and shall be and remain a charge and lien upon the lands, property, and funds belonging to said Apache Indians until paid in full, principal and interest.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand this amendment is satisfactory to all the parties interested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit another amendment.

Mr. MANN. There was an amendment pending, on page 17, line 17, which was passed over, and I think the gentleman from Texas is about to offer one in place of that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that was pending to line 17, page 17, considered on Tuesday last, and offer a substitute which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Texas will be granted.

There was no objection.

Page 17, line 17, insert the following paragraph:

"For the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River at Shiprock, N. Mex., on the Navajo Indian Reservation, to be immediately available, $16,500, which said sum of $16,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, shall be reimbursed to the United States by the Navajo Indians, and shall be and remain a charge and lien upon the lands, property, and funds belonging to said Navajo Indians until paid in full, principal and interest."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the Clerk to read that the amendment applies to line 17, page 17.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was a mistake; it comes in after line 16.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask, then, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment be considered as applying after line 16, page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been corrected.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas moved to strike out the last word and withdrew it, and I now yield to him.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee about a dispatch that I found in the New York Herald of last Tuesday, which reads as follows:

[Special dispatch to the Herald.]

SEEKS REPORTS OF SPECIAL INSPECTOR.

ANDOVER, MASS., Tuesday.

Prof. Warren K. Moorehead, one of the most energetic members of the Board of Indian Commissioners, says the great majority of the surviving North American Indians are in a far worse situation to-day than at any time since the discovery of America.

"That this is true," said Prof. Moorehead, "no man or woman familiar with Indian history will deny. It is only those persons who are not on the inside, so to speak, who assume that because we are spending several millions of dollars a year in maintaining our Indian Bureau the Indian problem is a thing of the past.

"It is a welcome sign that the public is at last aroused and that the Herald and other newspapers all over the United States are agitating a new Indian policy. While they all agree as to the essential features of this policy—the welfare of the people and the safeguarding of property rights—there is considerable discussion as to how this desired end is to be brought about.

"I am sorry the reports of E. B. Linnen, special inspector for Secretary Fisher, can not be made public. If the American taxpayers could realize what is in those reports such pressure would be brought to bear upon Congress that appropriations would be immediately available for the best possible men to save the American Indians before it is too late. Mr. Linnen has recently visited the leading reservations, and what he has seen and reported upon would seem more natural to have occurred in India in the poor districts or in darkest Russia, rather than in the United States. Nobody can deny the conditions; they are open to the eye of any traveler."

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman what are the Linnen reports, and if there are any Linnen reports, why should not they be made public?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is a question easier asked than answered. Two weeks ago my attention was called to this matter. Behind that I will say that last fall while in the West I heard of the same matter, and I know something of the conditions surrounding the Southern Ute Indian Reservation. There seems to be a trader there exploiting the Indians to his own advantage, and he is charged with standing in with the Indian agent, purchasing horses and animals not needed and padding the accounts of the agency.

I am satisfied that there is something very crooked in that agency. So, believing that, two weeks ago I wrote the department asking them to furnish us with the record. They have failed to do so up to this moment, and yesterday I received a letter saying they were not ready yet to give the information. The report was made last September and has been in the hands of the Indian Department since that time. If the statements made by this man Linnen are true, these men ought to be in the penitentiary instead of holding office under the Government.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does expect eventually to get the report?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I expect to get that report if it can be obtained by the power of this House.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand the inquiry of the gentleman, it is as to the entire report of Mr. Linnen.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes. It seems that Special Inspector Linnen has made an investigation of all of the reservations in the United States—not only the Southern Ute Reservation—and that these reports are now in the Department of the Interior. If they revealed any such condition as this dispatch indicates, the House should have those reports at once—dealing not only with the Southern Ute Reservation but with all the reservations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make this statement, that the letter from the commissioner which I received yesterday in reply to the letter which I had written him requesting him to forward the statement of Mr. Linnen to the committee was to the effect that they were still examining the matter, and that when they were through examining it they would report, or words to that effect.

Mr. COOPER. When was it filed?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About six months ago.

Mr. MURDOCK. And as soon as the matter is concluded the House is to have the report?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the statement of the commissioner.

Mr. COOPER. When was this Linnen report filed in the Interior Department?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It must have been in September last.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can throw some light on the matter.

Mr. COOPER. Then they have been examining that report through September, October, November, December, and a part of January and are not yet ready to submit it to the House?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has not been submitted.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman think that a report of that kind, which bears on the affairs of the Indians, ought to have been presented to the House and to the country before we take up this general appropriation bill for the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think so. I think they have had ample time.

Mr. COOPER. Why has not the committee insisted upon that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It had not come to our knowledge at that time. I had heard rumors of this matter while in the West on a recent visit, and when I came back here I got further information about the matter from private sources. I did not get it from the department at all. Then I wrote to the department and asked them to forward me the report of Mr. Linnen.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me further?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman from Texas think that any report submitted by an inspector to a department ought to be kept secret?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not. I think it is the public property of the Government.

Mr. COOPER. Has anybody in a department the authority to keep a report of that kind secret?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They exercise the authority, whether they have it or not.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman, who has made a study of this question for a long time, think there is any authority to suppress a report of that kind?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not; though this is the second time I have known of it being done.

Mr. DAVENPORT. At this session of Congress?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The chairman knows that we can reach this report through a resolution in the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I thought we could get it more quickly without the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the special report of Special Agent Linnen should be withheld, the chairman of the committee proposes to go after the report through the agency of a resolution in the House?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; unless it is returned to the committee at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Am I correct in my surmise that the report of this inspector covers all of the reservations in the United States?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Only that one reservation. This man, Mr. Linnen, is a general inspector for the whole United States and is subject to the order of the Secretary of the Interior, and he was sent to this special place to make this report, and did make the report and filed it, I am informed, in September last. I do not know what his report discloses, except what I have heard. I desire to state that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] suggests that he has made other reports upon other reservations. That is his business.

Mr. MURDOCK. My understanding was, as this dispatch relates, that he had found a deplorable condition virtually in all reservations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Possibly so. This is the only one that has been called to my attention.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Linnen is a regular inspector of the department. It is only a short time ago that he unearthed the fraud in respect to the mineral segregations in Oklahoma, and all three of those implicated at that time resigned under fire, without going to trial.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the information contained in this report ought not to be in the possession of the committee and the House before we legislate on this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that this bill carries only matters of appropriations, and any legislation could not be carried in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Would it not affect the amount of the appropriations for the purposes for which the appropriations are to be made if we knew the facts?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no item carried for the Southern Utes, according to my recollection, in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] just said that this report covers all the reservations in the country.

Mr. MURDOCK. My understanding is that Special Agent Linnen's report is a report covering generally the reservations in the United States, not merely the single instance of the Southern Utes in Utah.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. He is a general inspector, and he goes anywhere that he is sent. He is subject to the orders of the department.

Mr. COOPER. If that is so, ought not we to have the information before we make the appropriation?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No. We could not make an appropriation founded on anything in this report, as I understand it.

Mr. COOPER. But if the gentleman has not seen the report and knows nothing about it, and it relates to all reservations, the gentleman can not say what it contains.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This one Southern Ute Reservation is all I know of specifically.

Mr. COOPER. I have had people speak to me privately, saying things have been unearthed, but this particular report to which the gentleman from Kansas refers I never heard mentioned.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to state to the gentleman that any item in this bill for the immediate taking care of those people would be subject to a point of order, because, as the gentleman from Wisconsin well knows, this bill carries only items for the next fiscal year, and that would more properly come in a deficiency bill.

Mr. COOPER. But if these appropriations are to continue in office certain people—I do not know whether that is true or not—who may be justly attacked in this report of Mr. Linnen's, we would not make the appropriation continuing them in office. That is the point I am making. If there are accusations of fraud bearing upon the officers now doing this work, then we are continuing to appropriate for the very people whom this special agent criticizes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that this provision of the bill was made up from proper estimates by the department. They have furnished us no estimate relative to that matter, and I would say further that the trouble seems to be that they have a dishonest agent, who is in collusion with a trader. We have to pay some agent, and if this man were removed he would have a successor. He is not specifically named in the bill, but we appropriate so much money for so many employees at each agency.

Mr. COOPER. If that particular gentleman's integrity was attacked in this matter, they could apply a condition to the appropriation when some other man was appointed not to draw this man's salary.

Mr. MILLER. We must know it officially.

Mr. COOPER. We would know it officially if we had that report and it was here, as it ought to be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We could not have it here when this bill was under consideration. It may be that when the bill is before the other body it will be unearthed.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know why we could not delay appropriating for two or three days until we get that report. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] who it was that telegram related to?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Moorehead, of Andover, Mass., who is interested in some way as a citizen in the protection of the Indians.

Mr. MILLER. He is one of the commissioners of the Indian Rights Association. We have an appropriation to pay their expenses in Minnesota.

Mr. MURDOCK. And I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] does he know how long Special Agent Linnen has been engaged in this matter of investigation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we can not try all of these things before the committee. Therefore I will object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the construction of lateral distributing systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Uncompahgre, Uintah, and White River Utes, in Utah, and to maintain existing irrigation systems, authorized under the act of June 21, 1906, to be expended under the terms thereof and reimbursable as therein provided, $50,000.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I only rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner on traffic and tolls, before the Western Society of Engineers, Chicago, January 8, 1913, on the subject of "Unwisdom of toll exemption for coastwise shipping."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] submits a request for unanimous consent to have the address indicated by him printed in the RECORD. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The address is as follows:

The provision of the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls raises two questions: Our rights under the treaty of 1901 with Great Britain to adopt such a policy, and the economic wisdom or unwisdom of such a policy irrespective of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Two views are held as to the meaning of the treaty. One view is that the treaty means what it seems to say, i. e., that the principle of the neutralization of the canal as broadly established by Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 has been incorporated without impairment in the treaty of 1901 and that we have promised to treat our ships using the canal the same as we treat British ships. The other view is that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty merely requires the United States to accord equal treatment to the vessels of all other nations.

I do not wish to discuss the possible meanings that may be given to the phraseology used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I am, however, especially pleased by the stand taken by President Taft that the meaning of the treaty is a question to be arbitrated. Indeed, it seems certain that we must eventually either repeal the toll-exemption clause of the canal act of August 24, 1912, or arbitrate the question of the exemption of American ships from the payment of Panama tolls.

If the law stands as it is and tolls are collected on ships under the British flag and not on ships under our flag, Great Britain will doubtless insist upon damages, and if the demand is ignored by the United States, Great Britain may be expected to seek to cause our shipping or commerce to suffer by the amount of the damages she claims. Retaliatory measures on the part of Great Britain would certainly cause us to seek a settlement of the questions at issue. Of course, the settlement would be by arbitration, because it is inconceivable that Great Britain and the United States should be drawn into war over a difference of interpretation of the meaning of a treaty affecting the treatment of shipping.

As between arbitration of the question of the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of Panama tolls and the repeal of the toll-exemption clause of the canal act, the latter course is the wiser one to pursue. If we arbitrate and lose, we must return all the tolls that have been collected, and henceforth either charge no tolls or collect the same tolls on all vessels using the canal. If we arbitrate and win, we will but have established our right to pursue an unwise policy, a policy that is indefensible, whatever may be our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The policy of the United States with reference to the exemption of American coastwise ships from the payment of Panama tolls ought not to be decided with reference to the rights of the United States under the treaty. The questions to be considered are:

Do the coastwise carriers need to be given a subsidy of nearly $20,000,000 during the next 10 years?

Will the general public, shippers and consumers, be benefited by this subsidy, i. e., will freight rates by coastwise lines or by rail lines be lower?

Is this the best method of using public funds to aid the merchant marine?

Are tolls upon all ships needed to make the canal self-supporting and not a burden upon the general taxpayers?

1. It must be evident to every impartial student of the question that it is not necessary to relieve coastwise shipping of canal tolls as long as foreign-built ships are not allowed to engage in the domestic commerce of the United States. American shipowners have a monopoly of the coastwise trade. In 1911 there were 3,537,750 tons of American ships enrolled for the domestic trade on the Atlantic-Gulf and Pacific seaboards. The increase during the preceding decade had been 38 per cent. There is thus a relatively large and healthily increasing tonnage of coastwise shipping, and the opening of the Panama Canal will undoubtedly bring about a large addition to the coastwise fleet. Our coastwise marine is now given sufficient aid and protection by our navigation laws.

2. The sentiment in Congress and elsewhere in favor of relieving the coastwise shipping from the payment of Panama tolls seems to be due largely to the belief that if tolls are collected from the steamship lines the freight rates which they charge and the rates of the transcontinental railroads will be higher by the amount of the tolls, and the public will thus pay more in added freight rates than it will gain in tolls received. This argument, however, assumes an improbable adjustment of rail and water rates. The rates of the steamship lines and the railroads will not be higher if Panama tolls are collected from the coastwise lines.

Those who contend that the traffic carried by rail between the eastern and western parts of the United States will be charged rates increased by the rate of canal tolls assume that the rail charges must be and will be controlled by the coast-to-coast water rates and that the schedules of railroad rates will be fixed at such differentials above the water rates as the railroads can charge and secure traffic in competition with the rival water lines. In order to bring about this adjustment of rail and water rates there must be, first, active rate-controlling competition among the water lines, and, second, it must be the policy of the railroads to fix rates so as to compete actively with the carriers by water for practically all traffic moving between the two seaboards. Will these conditions exist?

It is the practice of steamship lines when operating between common termini to adjust services and rates by "conferences." The informal organizations or conferences of steamship companies are able to regulate competition and to prevent rates from being forced by competition to the level below which they could not be forced without making the business unprofitable. When several steamship lines operate over established routes and serve the same sections they are able by agreements and understandings with each other so to limit competition as to make their services and rates at least partially monopolistic. Unless prevented by effective Government regulation steamship companies will, like railroad companies, steadily increase the monopolistic character of their service.

If this analysis of the relation of steamship companies with each other be correct, it follows that the rates charged by steamship lines between the two seaboards of the United States will be, or will tend to be, not the lowest rates at which traffic can be profitably handled, but rates as high as the interested steamship lines think the rates can be put without limiting the growth of traffic or without losing tonnage to the railroad lines. Steamship companies, like railroad companies, will tend to charge what the traffic will bear; and steamship traffic will bear such rates as shippers will pay to have their goods transported by water instead of by rail. If this be true, the tendency will be for carriers by water to adjust their charges with reference to the schedules of railroad rates. In so far as this practice of rate making prevails, it will be impossible for the carriers by water to add the canal tolls to their rates. Whether there be canal tolls or not, rates by water carriers will be such as the traffic will bear; the upper limit of what traffic by water will bear will be the lower limit to which rates are brought by the railroad; and the tolls will be paid by the owners of the steamship lines instead of by the shippers in additional water rates.

In the case of chartered vessels, however, the shipper, not the owner of the vessels, must bear the burden of the canal tolls. Charter rates will necessarily be increased by the amount of the canal tolls; and, in so far as railroads compete with the chartered vessel for lumber and similar traffic, the canal tolls will be of advantage to railroads. This advantage, however, will be more theoretical than real. It is not probable that the railroads can in any event compete with the carrier by water for bulk cargoes of lumber, coal, and similar products. The railroads will be obliged to allow that traffic to move by water. They will not run the risk of depressing their general schedule of commodity and class rates for the purpose of preventing chartered vessels from securing traffic that can be handled between the two seaboards of the United States for $5 per ton.

It will be the policy of the railroads to allow a portion of the traffic that might be held to the rails to be shipped coastwise through the canal and to maintain rates upon the traffic which can readily be prevented from taking the canal route. It is probable that the railroads will adopt the general policy of surrendering without serious struggle the minor portion of their traffic in order to maintain profitable charges upon the major share of their tonnage.

The effect of canal tolls upon rail and water rates and the adjustment of the charges of coastwise and all-rail carriers handling traffic between the two seaboards of the United States may be summarized as follows:

Producers and consumers would not secure the major share of the benefits resulting from the remission of tolls upon coastwise shipping using the Panama Canal. On the traffic handled by steamship lines between the two seaboards rates will be but slightly affected by canal tolls. The coastwise traffic between our Atlantic and Pacific ports will consist mainly of general commodities and package freight handled by the established steamship lines. The rates charged by the steamship lines being regulated by agreements among competing companies and being fixed with reference to what the traffic will bear, will presumably be as high as traffic conditions warrant, regardless of tolls. The several lines will have uniform and relatively stable schedules of charges, and the rates of the steamship lines will ordinarily be adjusted with reference to the stable schedule of commodity and class rates prevailing upon the transcontinental railroads and their rail connections. If canal tolls are charged, the operating expenses of the steamship companies will be increased by the amount of the tolls, and their net profits will be lessened by the same amount.

Charter traffic between the two seaboards of the United States will be limited to a few commodities handled as bulk cargoes by or for the exceptionally large shipper. Chartered vessels will not compete with the regular steamship lines to such an extent nor in such a manner as generally to regulate the rates charged by the steamship lines on the greater portion of their traffic.

3. The exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of Panama tolls is a poor kind of subsidy to our merchant marine. The money will go to our shipping that needs no aid and not to our vessels that require assistance. If the United States is to adopt a ship-subsidy policy, and I personally would not oppose it, the public funds should go where needed, and should be granted in such a manner as to be effective in building up our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade in competition with ships under the flags of other countries. The experience of Japan, Germany, and even of Great Britain, shows that the only effective ship subsidies are those paid to strong lines operated over routes deemed important to the government granting the subsidy. To aid our merchant marine in such a way as to produce results, strong lines must be selected or created and given such support as they require to enable them to compete successfully with foreign steamship companies and grow stronger year by year; the Government must concentrate its aid and strengthen the strong lines assisted. It has been suggested that it would be wise for the United States to pay back the Panama tolls collected from the owners of American ships engaged in our foreign trade through the Panama Canal. Such a subsidy, however, would be so small and so thinly distributed as to be ineffective; moreover, the repayment to shipowners of the Panama tolls collected from them would invite similar action by other nations to overcome the effect of our action. Such a subsidy would be one suggesting retaliatory action.

4. Are tolls from all vessels using the Panama Canal necessary to make the canal commercially self-supporting, to prevent it from adding one more permanent load to the increasing burdens of the general taxpayers?

The annual revenue ultimately required to make the canal commercially self-supporting would be about $19,250,000. It is estimated that the operating and maintenance expenses will amount to $3,500,000 yearly, and that $500,000 will be required for sanitation and for the government of the zone. The interest on the cost of the canal—$375,000,000—at 3 per cent per annum, will amount to $11,250,000, and the treaty with Panama guarantees an annuity, beginning 1913, of $250,000 to the Republic of Panama. The sum of these four items is $15,500,000. If to this there be added 1 per cent per annum on $375,000,000 to accumulate a fund to amortize the investment, the total annual expenses will be $19,250,000.

The shipping using the Panama Canal during the early years of its operation will probably have an aggregate net tonnage of about 10,500,000 tons. At the beginning of the operation of the canal coastwise American shipping will probably amount to 1,000,000 net tons of this traffic. By the end of the first decade, i. e., 1925, it is probable that the total net tonnage of shipping passing through the canal will amount to about 17,000,000 tons, of which at least 2,000,000 net tons will probably be contributed by our coastwise shipping.

The tolls upon merchant vessels have been fixed by the President at $1.20 per net ton. It is thus possible that the revenues derived from the canal during the early years of its operation might average about $12,600,000 per annum, if all vessels, American and foreign, were to pay tolls. If the coastwise shipping is exempted from tolls the initial receipts from the canal will amount to less than $11,500,000 during the early years of operation. By 1925 the total traffic of 17,000,000 net tons might, if the rate of tolls were maintained at $1.20 per ton, yield a possible revenue of $20,400,000 if all ships, American and foreign, were required to pay the canal levies. In all probability, however, the rate of tolls will have been reduced to $1 per net ton by 1925, thus reducing the possible aggregate revenue to $17,000,000. The coastwise shipping of the United States in 1925 will doubtless contribute at least 2,000,000 of the probable 17,000,000 net tons of aggregate traffic. Thus, if the coastwise shipping does not pay tolls in 1925, and the rate of tolls is $1 per net ton, the probable revenue of the Panama Canal will then be $15,000,000 a year, or somewhat less than the estimated annual outlays for operation, zone sanitation, government, the Panama annuity, and the interest on the amount invested in the canal.

The United States Government should adhere to business principles in the management of the Panama Canal. While tolls levied at Panama should be low enough to permit commerce to derive substantial benefits from the canal, and while the charges for the use of the waterway should be well within what the traffic will bear, business prudence and political wisdom demand that the canal shall be commercially self-supporting providing revenues, large enough to enable the canal to carry itself, can be secured without unwisely restricting traffic. The tolls of $1.20 per net ton, as established by the President, will not unduly restrict the use of the canal, even by shipping least benefited by the waterway. Coastwise carriers between the two seaboards of the United States will derive the maximum benefit from the canal, and a rate at least three times the one established might be paid by coastwise carriers without restricting their use of the waterway.

The canal will cost the United States Government $375,000,000, much of which has been, or will be, secured by borrowing funds. The interest and principal of this debt must be paid either from funds secured by general taxes or from the revenues derived from canal tolls. Public expenditures are increasing rapidly. Funds are required in increasing amount for the promotion of the public health, for irrigation and reclamation, and for maintaining the military powers and naval prestige of the United States. Large expenditures upon rivers and harbors are urgently needed. Taxes must inevitably increase. The demands upon the United States are certain to be much greater in the future than they have been in the past, and it does not seem wise for the Federal Government to construct and maintain at the expense of the general budget such a costly public work as the Panama Canal. Those who derive immediate benefit from the use of the Panama Canal may properly return to the Government a portion of the profits secured from using the canal, provided this policy can be followed out without burdening commerce. It should be the policy of the United States to apply business principles to the management of the Panama Canal and to prevent its being a continuing burden upon the General Treasury and upon the taxpayers of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the construction of lateral distributing systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Uncompahgre, Uintah, and White River Utes, in Utah, and to maintain existing irrigation systems, authorized under the act of June 21, 1906, to be expended under the terms thereof and reimbursable as therein provided, $50,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] if he can tell us over what period of time Mr. Linnen, a special agent in the Interior Department, has investigated the conditions on various Indian reservations in the United States, what reports he has made, and what hope there is of any conclusion of this matter?

Mr. MILLER. I can only answer the gentleman in a general way, because my information is only general. I will say that Mr. Linnen is only an ordinary inspector in the Indian Bureau, and as such he travels where he is sent to make investigation and report. I know he has made some rather extended investigations in various places at different times, extending over several years, and, as with other inspectors, as is always the case, he makes his report in detail covering the subject he is sent to investigate. It has never been the custom to have those printed or to send them to Congress. They are in the nature, more or less, of the routine part of the work of the department. Prof. Moorehead, I am sure, has in mind something that Mr. Linnen may have said in some of his recent reports.

Mr. MURDOCK. How recent?

Mr. MILLER. There is no general investigation which he has made or no general report. He has made some special reports covering special investigations, the same as other inspectors have made, and he has made some, no doubt, recently. I presume he is making them monthly, or if he has a detail covering more than a month, he makes them bimonthly. These investigations are not general investigations of the Indian question. These reports are always available. Several of them have been published as documents from time to time as called for. If somebody calls for these they will be published as a document. Any Member who would go to the office of the Secretary of the Interior could get a copy of them.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not believe for a minute that Prof. Moorehead is right in his conclusions that the conditions that exist in the reservations in the United States could only be equaled in India or Russia for distress?

Mr. MILLER. Prof. Moorehead is a very high-minded man. He is holding his position simply because of a desire to perform a good public service. I must confess, after some reasonable investigation, that some of his knowledge must be from hearsay and is not always correct. I know he means what he says, but I can not always accept his conclusions, because I do not feel that they are true.

I have investigated several Indian reservations in the last four or five years, and I would not hesitate to say that the condition of the Indians in this country at large is vastly superior to what it ever was before, but that does not conclude that in several places there has been great wrong, and in many instances there has been great fraud, and that eternal vigilance is the price of success in the handling of the Indian question all along the line. And it is to the advantage of the whole situation that men like Prof. Moorehead keep raking it up.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then does not the gentleman think that we ought to have all the information of the Linnen reports?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir. It has never been the practice in the department to publish them.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say that in one case I was asked to have the commissioner give me a report of Mr. Linnen. I called at the office. The Secretary said that the information contained in the report was to be used before a grand jury in Arizona, and therefore could not be published at that time. Mr. Linnen was sent to Arizona and the agent was indicted, and Mr. Linnen's testimony was used before the grand jury before anybody else saw it.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that I know something about Prof. Warren K. Moorehead, who has been brought into this discussion. I have known him personally for 20 years. I regard him as one of the greatest living authorities on the American Indian. What he knows about the Indian he does not base on what he has read in books. He has studied these subjects personally and at first hand. He has written a number of books on the Indian that are not theoretical, but practical, and are entirely reliable. In my judgment what he says about the Indians should carry a great deal of weight.

Mr. MURDOCK. In view of that statement, then, I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that this is rather a severe indictment.

Mr. WILLIS. It is, if Prof. Moorehead really said what the newspapers quoted him as saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, what is pending before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL] is recognized.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to have one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of justice to the officials of the Uintah Indian Reservation I wish to correct some misinformation that has been given on the floor of the House recently. The Uintah Indian Reservation in Utah, to which reference has been made, has not been examined by Special Agent Linnen. It has been examined by an agent of the department, and while there have been some suggestions made with reference to the administration of the reservation, there was no criticism made whatever as to the handling of the funds of the Indians. The officers in charge were found to be absolutely clear from any taint or semblance of corruption in the discharge of the important trusts which have been imposed upon them.

The Southern Ute Reservation, which was designated as being located in Utah, is in Colorado, and I felt like making the record straight, so that the officers of the Uintah Indian Reservation might not rest under the imputation of having been found guilty of corruption.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at the Cushman Indian School, Tacoma, Wash., including repairs and improvements, and for pay of superintendent, $50,000, said appropriation being made to supplement the Puyallup school funds used for said school.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to page 30, after line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 30, after line 6, by adding the following:

"For support and civilization of the Kalispel Indians in the county of Pend Oreille, in the State of Washington, to erect a school building, employees' quarters, and other necessary buildings, and providing the same with equipment, in the purchase of stock, implements, seeds, and other articles necessary to promote the general welfare of said Indians, including the employment of teachers and instructors, under the jurisdiction of the Spokane Indian School, Spokane, Wash., with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000.

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make allotments, under the general allotment act, to the Kalispel Indians in the county of Pend Oreille, in the State of Washington, of the following-described lands, which they are now occupying, to wit:

"Township 34 N., range 44 E.: Section 20, S. ½ of SE. ¼ and S. ½ of SW. ¼; section 29, all except the SE. ¼ of SE. ¼; section 30, lots 1, 6, 7, and 12; section 31, lots 1, 6, 7, and 12; section 32, NW. ¼ of NE. ¼, N. ½ or NW. ¼, SW. ¼ of NW. ¼, and W. ½ of SW. ¼.

"Township 33 N., range 44 E.: Section 5, lots 4, 5, and 6, SW. ¼ of NW. ¼, and E. ½ of SW. ¼; section 6, lots 1, 6, and 7; section 8, lots 1, 2, 3, and 4; E. ½ of NW. ¼, E. ½ of SW. ¼, SE. ¼ of NE. ¼, W. ½ of SE. ¼, and SE. ¼ of SE. ¼; section 17, all; section 18, lots 1, 6, 7, and 12; section 19, lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 12; section 20, all except E. ½ of SE. ¼; section 29, all; section 30, lots 1, 6, and 7; section 32, lots 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, and 7, N. ½ of NE. ¼, and SE. ¼ of NE. ¼; section 33, S. ½ of NW. ¼, N. ½ of SW. ¼, SE. ¼ of SW. ¼, and lot 1.

"Total area, 4,449.27 acres."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order for two minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have offered is an amendment which I offered to the bill on a previous occasion. It is to provide for a band of 100 Indians in my district in the State of Washington. Some 25 years ago the Government moved the tribe from their abiding place, and this little band, like the Seminole Indians in Florida, refused to leave their hunting grounds or homes, and the Government set aside the prescribed tract of land I have set forth in the amendment for them to reside on. They have lived there for 25 years without any allotments and without any assistance received from the Government in any shape, form, or manner. The country thereabouts has been settled up, and the game has been driven out, and those people are in destitute circumstances. I think it is only an act of justice that they should be provided for.

The Government set aside this land for them 25 years ago, but it was never allotted to them. They have never had any schools or anything else done for them, and they are surely as much the wards of the Government as are the Seminoles or any of the Indians in Oklahoma.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the gentleman, and I suggest that the best way for him to proceed is to go to the department and get the department to use for the purpose he has in mind part of the lump-sum appropriation that we make for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They told me at the department that they wished something could be done in this matter, but that they did not have the authority.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then why does not the gentleman draft a bill and present it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, so that the committee could get a report from the department and the bill could come up in the regular way? It can not come in the appropriation bill at this time. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 250 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Tomah, Wis., and for pay of superintendent, $43,450; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; in all, $49,450.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 30, by inserting after the figures "$6,000," in line 15, the following: "For improvement of boiler house and installation of central heating plant, including boilers, $8,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is clearly new legislation. It provides for a new boiler and fire house.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, this is an improvement in the existing plant, and evidently it can not be subject to the point of order made by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The present occupant of the chair has declared in a ruling this afternoon that where the Government has established a policy it would be lawful to enact legislation to carry out such a policy.

The Government has established an Indian school at this place. The heating plant is but an incident thereto, and hence an improvement in such heating plant would not be subject to the objection made by the gentleman as new legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the gentleman is wholly in error. This term "general repairs and improvements" has been held to mean repairs and improvements on buildings used, or upon the water plant or something of that kind attached to the school, for school purposes. The term "general repairs and improvements" is well known, and does not contemplate erecting any new buildings or anything of the kind, and it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. ESCH. A heating plant would be exactly in line with what the gentleman has just stated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then if it is, they would not need this, because it would come under the head of general repairs and improvements, and this $7,000 could be used for the purpose of putting it in.

Mr. ESCH. You cut it down over a thousand dollars below what it was last year. It is very necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is evidently subject to the point of order. The heating plant is not mentioned in the bill, and it could not possibly be construed to cover the heating plant. If it could, it could cover the school building or anything else.

Mr. ESCH. There is a heating plant there now. This is an improvement thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman the act upon which this item in the bill was based?

Mr. ESCH. I have not the act at hand. I suppose it would hark back to the organic law providing for this school.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman that act?

Mr. ESCH. I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman get it? We can pass this for the time being?

Mr. ESCH. I will try to get the authority. I ask that the item may be passed for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will then continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. For support and civilization of Shoshone Indians in Wyoming, including pay of employees, $12,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The department estimated $15,000 for this purpose this year. The additional $3,000 was partly intended to cover contemplated increases in the salaries of some of the officials. Inasmuch as the committee has taken the position that it will not agree to any increases whatever in salaries, it is hardly worth while for me to offer an amendment, as the committee would not agree to it and it could not be adopted. Therefore I shall offer no amendment at this point, but express the hope that the committee will be a little more liberal in this matter in the future. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 175 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Shoshone Reservation, Wyo., and for pay of superintendent, $31,025; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; in all, $35,025.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 2 and 3, page 31, strike out "$4,000; in all, $35,025," and insert in lieu thereof "$6,000; in all, $37,025."

Mr. FERRIS. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The item is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept this amendment. It increases this item $2,000. The estimate of the department was $6,000 above what the committee has allowed. The entire sum should have been allowed, because it is greatly needed for slight increases in a few salaries, but more particularly for the improvements of the dairy barn. Gentlemen are aware that while this school is on a reservation, it is specifically appropriated for, and therefore none of the sums in the general appropriation can be used for repairs. Therefore this school and the farm adjacent must be cared for and the improvements made entirely out of these items. Among the other buildings in connection with the school is a dairy barn which is in a very bad condition. It should be rebuilt. The department estimates that $4,000 is needed for this work, but I am only asking the committee to give us $2,000, in the hope that with the increase of $2,000 they may repair or partly rebuild the dairy barn so that it will be possible to continue to use it. On page 141 of the hearings this language is used by the commissioner:

This will leave a balance of about $4,000 for use in constructing a new dairy barn at the school, which is badly needed, as the one now in use is in a dilapidated condition, tumbling in and not worth repairing, and wholly unfit to keep stock in.

As a matter of fact, what is contemplated is really to rebuild the dairy barn, and $4,000 is needed for that purpose; but if the committee will add $2,000 to the appropriation I hope that they may be able to make that improvement. Without it the building is likely to be in condition where it can not be used at all. I should ask for more for this purpose. I should ask for an increase in the salary of the superintendent, and for other officials, if I believed there was any hope of securing it, but as I know all such increases would be opposed and defeated I am only asking what I feel is absolutely essential.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman whether or not this is a structure of stone, brick, or lumber?

Mr. MONDELL. This building has perhaps a stone foundation, but built, as I recollect, of native lumber, and the new building would, I assume, be built of native lumber, which the Indians would largely get out themselves. The money would be expended to a considerable extent for Indian labor. They would saw the material at their own sawmill, I hope, and get the material from their own reservation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would it be necessary to rebuild the barn entirely?

Mr. MONDELL. Very largely, I am inclined to think. Practically it would be necessary to go to the foundation and then come up with a new structure. Possibly there is material in the old barn that they will use, but practically the barn should be rebuilt.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How long has the barn been there?

Mr. MONDELL. I should say 20 years or more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many cows and other animals do they have?

Mr. MONDELL. They have a considerable farm, about 1,200 acres, and a herd of cows to furnish milk, cream, and make the butter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman know the size of the barn?

Mr. MONDELL. No; but it is quite a large barn; they estimate that it would cost $4,000; but with this increase they will have in all $6,000 for all needed repairs, and I am in hopes that out of this $6,000 they can take enough to rebuild the barn and then have a small sum for other repairs. It will not give the amount that they ought to have, but it will help some.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Wyoming has another amendment. Is the gentleman willing to take the additional amount out of the general appropriation?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the work of constructing an irrigation system within the diminished Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, including the maintenance and operation of completed canals, $50,000, reimbursable in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted at the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 9, insert the following as a new paragraph:
"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to use not to exceed $1,000 of the sum herein appropriated for the purpose of making an investigation of the conditions of the roads and bridges of the said Wind River Reservation, and shall submit a report thereon, together with maps and plans of said roads, together with an estimated cost of construction of the suitable and necessary roads and bridges on said reservation."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This does not enlarge the appropriation?

Mr. MONDELL. It does not enlarge the appropriation at all. It does not increase the appropriation, but gives the Secretary of the Interior an opportunity to make a needed investigation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware, if he gets this amendment, that it will be subject to a point of order in a succeeding bill—that the appropriation would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that. The gentleman understands that any appropriation that was made following this report, if the report should justify an appropriation, would, perhaps, be subject to a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The whole provision is reimbursable?

Mr. MONDELL. It is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indians are requesting that this shall be done?

Mr. MONDELL. I think they desire to have good roads.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman is there any money in the Treasury to the credit of these Indians?

Mr. MONDELL. There is not very much at this time, but the Indians have over a million acres of land that by law are subject to sale now and are being sold from time to time. In addition to that they have a reservation which they own in common in addition to their allotment, and a good deal of it is very good land.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, the property of these Indians amounts to $2,212,140.68; so I assume that the Government would get its money back.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is any question about that.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, there was an amendment offered by me, on page 30 of this bill, that was passed over. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment to which the gentleman from Texas made objection and offer in lieu thereof the following which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 15, page 30, by striking out the figures $6,000 and inserting in lieu thereof $14,000.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the prime object of asking for an increase in this appropriation is to improve the heating plant at the Tomah Indian School. The heating plant they have there heats only two buildings, and there are a dozen buildings on the grounds. They have separate boilers and separate buildings. The purpose is to connect the several buildings with a central plant, and enlarge the plant in order to meet the new demands. The separate heating plants in the several buildings have been installed many years. The several boilers are in bad condition and can not be put to the highest capacity to get the highest pressure and meet the low temperatures that we have in that climate. The cost of repairs is increasing year by year by reason of the separate heating plants in the separate buildings. It is a matter of great economy to install a separate plant and heat all the buildings, not only an economy as to service, but a great economy in coal consumption. The coal cost last year $7,500 to heat these buildings. Col. Pringle, supervising engineer of the Indian service, declares that with an improved plant there would be a saving of 15 to 20 per cent, which would amount to $1,500 a year. So the cost of this improvement can be saved in five years. No private individual or private corporation would persist in maintaining the heating system that we have there in that school to-day. They would install a central plant to effect the economies that I have suggested. I hope, on the plea of economy, if on no other, the gentlemen will consent to the increase in this item.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman how old this school is.

Mr. ESCH. Over 20 years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many students are there?

Mr. FERRIS. The enrollment is 269 and the attendance 239.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the cost per capita?

Mr. ESCH. I think $177.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the size of the farm that they have?

Mr. ESCH. Three hundred and forty acres.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What kind of buildings have they?

Mr. ESCH. They are of brick.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Are they of brick throughout?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; except two or three small buildings.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I see they have been making appropriations for general repairs and improvements right along, as they do usually in all of these schools. If these are brick buildings, why is it that they would be needing repairs from year to year if only 20 years old?

Mr. ESCH. In the one item of repairing boilers in these separate buildings I understand the cost one year was almost $1,000. Then they are trying to replace the old pine floors of these schools with hardwood, and have tried to put in cement sidewalks. They have tried to enlarge the dairy barn and to make other improvements. They have also improved the waterworks.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman know what the additional amount estimated was?

Mr. ESCH. Twenty-one thousand dollars by the superintendent, which includes, however, an employees' building.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that $4,000 would be enough for the purpose that he desires?

Mr. ESCH. I am afraid it would not, because of the cost of connecting the central plant with these 12 buildings. We have to lay the pipes 5 feet under ground.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will be willing to accept an amendment of $4,000.

Mr. ESCH. Will not the gentleman make it $5,000? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am willing to make it $4,000.

Mr. ESCH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will amend my amendment by making it $10,000, being an addition of $4,000, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 15, page 30, by striking out the figures "$6,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$10,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And by changing the totals to correspond.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent now to return to page 10 of the bill, to the item under California.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the understanding that if there was no objection the committee would return to that item.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This item was passed over on last Tuesday in order that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] might have an opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think the item has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the item.

The Clerk read as follows:

CALIFORNIA.

SEC. 3. For support and civilization of Indians in California, including pay of employees, and for the purchase of small tracts of land situated adjacent to lands heretofore purchased, and for improvements on lands for the use and occupancy of Indians in California, $57,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve a point of order. I desire to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] a question. He seems to have some interest in this matter.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no interest especially, except as a Representative from California to the end that these unfortunate people be properly cared for.

Mr. FOSTER. How many Indians are there in California?

Mr. RAKER. Something over 20,000.

Mr. FOSTER. And how much land have they?

Mr. RAKER. I am not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. This is irrigated property?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; this is throughout the entire State.

Mr. FOSTER. How long has Congress been appropriating $57,000 to buy little strips of lands around where these Indians are located? Can the gentleman inform us?

Mr. RAKER. No. I can say this, that Congress has never been appropriating $57,000 for this purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I think it has for several years.

Mr. RAKER. They have been appropriating big amounts, but not sufficient, of course, for the purpose of education and maintenance of Indians, and, incidentally, for the purchase of some lands.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the gentleman inform the committee how much of this $57,000 is expended for salaries for men looking after this all of the time?

Mr. RAKER. I am unable to state the exact amount.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman know whether there are men who are employed constantly to pick up those little pieces of land?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; I am satisfied of that.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I am satisfied of that.

Mr. FOSTER. My understanding is that there is a certain one who is kept busy there all of the time, employed by the year.

Mr. RAKER. I think that does not apply to the State of California for the purpose of picking up land.

Mr. FOSTER. They are buying this land.

Mr. RAKER. No one, as I understand it, is engaged in that special occupation.

Mr. FOSTER. Who looks after buying this land?

Mr. RAKER. First, it would be the agents or the superintendents of the schools near by where they are looking after the other matters, and if it becomes necessary to obtain some small tracts they would do so.

Mr. FOSTER. They spend $57,000 every year?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; this does not cover all. The purpose of the bill is for the support and civilization of the Indians of California. That goes over the entire State.

Mr. FOSTER. And the purchase of land?

Mr. RAKER. And incidentally—and it is so incidental that it amounts to very little—there are occasionally small pieces of land that are obtained adjacent to some particular tract now held by the Government for the use of the school or otherwise, and there have been a few instances where they have purchased a little tract for some Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman propose to increase this amount?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; as recommended by the department in its estimate and, further, as shown by virtue of correspondence with the department.

Mr. FOSTER. How much does the gentleman propose to increase it?

Mr. RAKER. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. For the purpose of buying land or paying salaries?

Mr. RAKER. For the purpose of absolute necessaries for the care and support of the Indians. There are a number in the State that are unprovided for. Even our counties are assisting all they can, and I am informed by the department that they have used up every cent that they appropriated last year and that there are needy Indians in the State, scattered over the State, that ought to have the care and assistance of the department, and the department is unable to give them that care on account of not having the funds.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's argument is so convincing to me that I am willing to withdraw the point of order. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out the figures "57,000," at the end of line 23, on page 10, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "60,000."

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there any specific piece of land that it is designed to purchase?

Mr. RAKER. This does not apply to the land at all, and I hope it will not be used for land, but for the actual necessaries for the maintenance of the old Indians scattered all over California. I have a letter here——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does that change the language of the law heretofore?

Mr. RAKER. No; this is just the same. I only strike out "fifty-seven thousand" and put in "sixty thousand."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Just changing the totals?

Mr. RAKER. That is all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I withdraw any objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has finished, I rise to oppose the amendment. I certainly hope the chairman of our committee will not accede to that amendment. If I understand the purport of it, he is introducing a revolutionary and most remarkable proceeding. Every State has many indigent, poverty-stricken, perhaps suffering, Indians scattered through it. It is because of humanity actuating the respective communities in which they may live that they extend some care to them. If they have some property rights or tribal rights, it is the duty of the Government to look after them somewhat, but never since I have been a member of the committee have we appropriated from the Federal Treasury a dollar for an agent who is going over a State to find some needy Indians and pay it to them. I understood the gentleman to say that he wanted $3,000 to take care of these poor and needy Indians.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. There is in this bill provided for the care and support and civilization of Indians in California, $57,000. Now, there have been a number of applications to the department more than furnished last year for these Indians. Last year they were unable to do it, and they are unable to do it this year. They recommended that $60,000 be appropriated. According to their letter to me they say it ought to be $75,000.

Mr. MILLER. Are you speaking of the department's estimate?

Mr. RAKER. I am speaking of the letter of the department.

Mr. MILLER. I am speaking of the department's estimate.

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir; I have a letter here.

Mr. MILLER. And the letter is from the local officer?

Mr. RAKER. No; it is from the Secretary here, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Adams. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your letter of December 30, 1912, addressed to the Indian Office, regarding the appropriations for the Fort Bidwell and Greenville Indian schools, I have the honor to advise you that the department has submitted favorable reports, with amendments, on H. R. 26669 and H. R. 26670, introduced by you, providing specific appropriations for the Fort Bidwell and Greenville Indian schools. There are inclosed for your information copies of the reports of the department on these bills.

The department will be glad to see the provisions contained in H. R. 26669 and H. R. 26670, if amended as suggested, incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill and a specific appropriation provided for these schools.

Referring to the appropriation for the support and civilization of Indians in California, your attention is invited to the estimate of the department found on page 401 of the estimates of appropriations, 1914, wherein the department requested $60,000 for this work. The Indian bill, H. R. 26874, as reported by the House Committee on Indian Affairs, carries an appropriation of only $57,000 for this work. While there is need for $75,000 for the support and civilization of Indians in California, the department would be satisfied if its estimate for this work, amounting to $60,000, were provided for in the Indian appropriation bill.

Referring to the Indian school at Riverside, Cal., you are advised that the department's estimate for this school is as follows:

"For support and education of 550 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., for pay of superintendent, and for general repairs and improvements, $105,000; new buildings, $20,000; central heating plant, $15,000; in all, $140,000."

The Indian bill as reported to the House carries an appropriation of only $104,350 for the Riverside school. The Riverside plant, by the use of the sleeping porches which have been added to a number of the dormitories, has a capacity of about 700. In view of the fact that this school can now accommodate about 700 pupils, it would be in the interest of economy in the expenditure of public funds to authorize the enrollment of 700 pupils, provided Congress would appropriate for the support of this number.

The increase in the enrollment at this school from 550 to 700 would require an additional appropriation over the estimate submitted by the department of $25,050, this amount being determined on the basis of $167 per pupil.

A new building for employees' quarters is one of the urgent needs of the Riverside School. In this connection your attention is invited to the letter of the department of even date in answer to your letter of December 23, 1912, with which you inclosed a copy of a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of Riverside, Cal., regarding the Riverside Indian School.

Referring to your inquiry regarding the needs of the Indians of the Klamath River Indian Reservation, your attention is invited to the report of the department dated December 21, 1911, transmitting a draft of legislation which has been introduced as H. R. 16683, which, if enacted, would enable the department to use the available funds arising from the sale of the lands of said Indians for their benefit. I should be glad to see enacted at this session of the Congress H. R. 16683.

The department will be pleased to furnish any additional information that you may desire regarding the matters to which you refer in your letter of December 30, 1912.

Respectfully,
SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. MILLER. Very well; I am glad to have that information. Still, Mr. Chairman, it does not alter the situation from my own viewpoint. In the first place, to my mind, this is an exceedingly dubious paragraph. I always have thought so, and that it was subject to a point of order. It contains several things which, if it were a new proposition, I never would give my consent to. For instance, it authorizes the purchase of small tracts of land situated adjacent to land heretofore purchased. What tracts of land, by whom purchased, and what for?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as most of my time was occupied by other gentlemen, I ask an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. That in itself would be sufficient to defeat the bill if it were an original proposition. A year ago we allowed $57,000. Does not the committee see fit to reappropriate that exact amount? Now, in view of the peculiar and particular character of this appropriation I do not think it wise for the gentleman to ask to increase it, because if he does it may be that the next time it falls by it will not be in at all. I do not believe this kind of an appropriation should ever be started, but, having once been started, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it should ever be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have printed as a part of my remarks a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, and also one from Mr. Abbott, the acting commissioner, dated December 21.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 31, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Receipt is hereby acknowledged of your letter of December 18, making inquiry in regard to the status of certain indigent Indians living at Hay Fork, Trinity County, Cal.

In reply, I have the honor to advise you that these Indians are located about 100 miles from the nearest Indian school, Round Valley Indian School, at Covelo, Cal., and the superintendent states that it will take at least two weeks' time and cost approximately $75 for each visit made to these Indians. At times it would be impossible for him to visit them on account of the dangerous streams between the two places.

For administrative purposes, these Indians are considered under the jurisdiction of Mr. Horace G. Wilson, in charge of the nonreservation Indians of Oregon and California, with headquarters at Roseburg, Oreg., about 200 miles from where these Indians live.

The office always stands ready to furnish real emergency relief to Indians in a starving or destitute condition within the territory where the service has facilities for such action and as far as applicable funds are available.

As heretofore set forth in previous correspondence in regard to the matter, it is practically impossible, owing to the limited amount of funds available, for this office to give more than occasional temporary relief to these Indians. With the funds appropriated for the Indians in the State of California it is practically impossible to provide for the needs and industrial advancement of the Indians directly under the jurisdiction of the various superintendents, and at the present time there is no balance of the amount appropriated for the "Support of Indians in California" for the present fiscal year except what is already hypothecated for certain definite purposes.

In the estimate of needs for the Indian Service during the fiscal year 1914 the department estimated that at least $60,000 would be necessary for the Indians in California and $250,000 to provide for the "Relieving of distress and prevention of disease, etc., among Indians," which amounts, as reported from the committee, have been cut to $57,000 and $90,000, respectively.

It will thus be seen that the amounts approved by the committee are considerably less than those estimated as absolutely necessary for the needs of the Indians in your State and to provide for the relief of destitution among Indians in all parts of the country.

Respectfully,

F. H. ABBOTT,
Acting Commissioner.

(See copy of other letter preceding.)

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following at the end of line 23, on page 10:

"For the support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, Greenville, Cal., and for pay of superintendent, $18,700; for general repairs and improvements, $1,000; for construction of septic tank and sewerage system, $3,000; for an employees' building, to be used for employees' quarters, club, kitchen, dining room, $4,000; for shop building for instructing the boys in blacksmithing and carpentry, $1,200; for school farm for maintaining the school stock and small dairy herd, and for raising fruits, grains, and vegetables, $7,000; for a school and assembly building for general meetings and entertainments, $8,000; for a complete steam-heating plant for school and accessory buildings, $6,000; for a boys' dormitory with a capacity of 75, $5,000; for a steam laundry with a capacity of washing and ironing for 150 persons, $2,600; in all, $56,500."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is new legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Will not the gentleman reserve the point of order for a moment?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to state to the gentleman frankly that I think it would be unwise legislation to permit a new school plant to be erected without investigation and full report on the matter. We have had no chance to make that investigation, and hence I make the point of order. If the gentleman desires to make a statement, I will yield him the five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. The school at Greenville has been built for quite a number of years. It is a wooden structure. Both boys and girls use it. The dormitory for the boys is at one end and that for the girls is at the other end. The school needs much improvement in the way of new buildings and general improvements to the premises. I will read what the Secretary of the Interior says in regard to it in his letter under date of January 2, 1913; and by way of remark I may say they estimated in the regular estimates for 1914, on page 401, for this school building as a separate institution. Here is what the Secretary says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The department acknowledges receipt of a letter received from Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated December 5, in which he incloses copies of House bill No. 26670, providing an appropriation for the support and education of Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, California, as follows: For support and education, $18,700; repairs and improvements, $1,000; septic tank, $3,000; employees' building, kitchen, dining room, etc., $4,000; shop building, $1,200; purchase school farm, $7,000; school and assembly building, $8,000; complete heating plant, $6,000; boys' dormitory, capacity 75, $5,000; and a steam laundry, capacity 150 persons, $2,600; making a total of $56,500.

He requests that a report be made to the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

There is urgent need for a well-equipped school at Greenville. It is located in a section of California where there are a large number of Indian pupils who have not access to any school. It is estimated that there are over 300 out of school and largely without school facilities of any character. The present capacity of the Greenville School is about 100. It has no shop buildings, employees' quarters, central heating or sewage systems, and the other buildings are inadequate for the purposes for which they are used. The plant should be very substantially improved. This bill provides for the support of 100 pupils for the year 1914, and if it should be approved the new buildings provided for will increase the capacity to 150 pupils.

The item of $5,000 for a dormitory for 75 boys is, however, too small. This should be changed to $15,000, which will make ample provision for the construction of a dormitory with a capacity of 50 or 60 pupils.

This department has heretofore recommended that this school be specifically provided for. In the estimate submitted by this department for the proposed bill, making provisions for the entire Indian Service, it is recommended that $30,000 be given this school—$20,000 for the support of 100 Indian pupils and repairs and improvements and $10,000 for new buildings. This estimate for Greenville, however, was very conservative.

The provisions of the bill proposed by Congressman RAKER are much more liberal and are justified by the needs of the Indian service in this community; and, with the change suggested, I should be glad to see the provisions contained in H. R. 26670 incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill as a specific appropriation for the Greenville Indian School. If that be impracticable, I trust the bill may receive consideration as a separate measure.

Respectfully,

WALTER L. FISHER, Secretary.

I also have here a letter under date of November 25, 1912, from the superintendent of the Indian school at Greenville. I want to state—and I think the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will bear me out in the statement—that, while the members of the committee, as I know, want to be fair, and are fair, they have not had an opportunity, except from these reports, to go into the matter, although the school is there. Here is the report from the Secretary of the Interior, and a letter from the Indian Service, and from the superintendent at Greenville Indian School, showing the necessity of this school. Here is what the superintendent says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
GREENVILLE INDIAN SCHOOL,
Greenville, Cal., November 25, 1912.

HON. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Complying with request contained in your letter of the 16th instant, I take pleasure in submitting herewith itemized estimates of improvements needed at this school, with amount for general support, trusting that same can be included in the bill under special appropriation for this school.

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at Greenville School, Cal., and for pay of superintendent, $18,700.

For general repairs and improvements, $1,000.

For construction of septic tank and overhauling the sewer system, $3,000. The sewer discharge at present is into an open field and is not sanitary, and complaints are being made by residents in vicinity. This needed improvement should be appropriated for by all means.

An employees' building, to be used for employees' quarters, club kitchen, dining room, etc., $4,000.

A shop building, 30 by 50 feet, for instructing the boys in blacksmithing and carpentry, $1,200.

A school farm for maintaining school stock and a small dairy herd and for raising fruits, grains, and vegetables, $7,000. At present the institution has not an acre of farming or grazing land, and, of course, the boys can not be given training in agricultural pursuits.

A school and assembly building, $8,000. At present there is no place for general meetings, entertainments, etc. All exercises of this kind must be held in a small classroom, which is entirely inadequate, or in the dining room, which is not at all suited to the purpose.

A complete steam-heating plant, $6,000. At present the buildings are all heated by wood stoves, which method is both unsatisfactory and dangerous.

A boys' dormitory with a capacity of 75, $5,000. The present system of housing both sexes in the same building is extremely unsatisfactory; besides, this additional dormitory is badly needed.

A steam laundry, with a capacity of washing for 150 persons, $2,600.

Of course, it will be understood that when the desired improvements in the way of buildings are completed the capacity of the school will be increased to 150, which number should then be appropriated for.

Trusting this information will suit your purpose and that the whole list may be included in the bill for this school, I am, with best wishes,

Very sincerely, W. S. CAMPBELL,
W.S.C.–W.J.Z. Supt. & S. D. A.

Yet I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I will have to submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to state——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is now an appropriation sufficient to run this school out of the lump-sum appropriation, and the lump-sum appropriation is $1,400,000. This school has heretofore been supported from the general item for Indian schools support, which takes care of all the Indian schools. This school, however, has become insufficient, and in order to relieve the Fort Bidwell School it should have a specific appropriation. The school is already appropriated for under the lump-sum appropriation, and I do not see any sufficient reason why we should change it from the lump-sum appropriation to a specific appropriation. For that reason I must urge the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I will have to submit to the point of order. Let the Chair decide.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in connection with this amendment I be permitted to insert a letter of the Secretary of the Interior of date January 2, 1912, and also a letter from the superintendent of the Indian school at Fort Bidwell, showing the necessity of this improvement, and a letter from the Assistant Secretary of date January 3, 1913, covering these general bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] desires authority to have done the printing indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the additional letters referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The department acknowledges receipt of a letter from Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated December 5, in which he incloses copy of H. R. 26669, providing an appropriation for the support and education of the Indian pupils of the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Fort Bidwell, Cal., and for repairs and improvements, and for other purposes, as follows: Cost of employees, $10,500; for clothing, subsistence, and operating expenses, $7,101; for open-market purchases, $1,000; for transportation of supplies from railroad, $500; for telephone and telegraph expenses, $100; for transportation of pupils to and from school, $500; for cement walks, $3,000; for woven-wire fence, $1,000; for irrigation work, $500; for farming experiments, $300; for new school building, $10,000; for new superintendent's quarters, $2,500; for traveling expenses, $300; for harvesting, thrashing, and grinding, $350; for financial clerk, $600; for automobile for use of school and superintendent, $1,200; for sawmill, planer, and equipment, $3,000; for clearing and grubbing 200 acres, $500; making a total appropriation of $42,951.

Mr. RAKER requests that a report be made to the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

The form of this bill is objectionable because it sets out specifically a large number of items which can be better provided for by including them in the general term "Repairs and improvements," and for administrative reasons it will be an advantage to have them so grouped. One item of $500 for transportation of goods and supplies should be eliminated for the reason that there is a general fund from which all such expenses are paid. This is also true of the item of $500 for the transportation of Indian pupils. The item of $600 for financial clerk may also be eliminated, as this position can be regularly provided for in the salary list. I have the honor to recommend that the entire second paragraph be stricken out and that lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the first paragraph be changed to read as follows: "appropriated, for the support and education of 125 Indian pupils at the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Fort Bidwell, Cal., and for repairs and improvements, $25,250; for an automobile, $1,200; for new school building, $10,000; for superintendent's cottage, $2,500; and for a sawmill, $3,000; in all, $41,951."

The Paiutes are very poor and are in great need of assistance. There are approximately 60 children of this tribe that should be accommodated in this school. A large number of advanced children from the Pit River Indians should also be enrolled here, these latter Indians having heretofore enrolled few of their children in nonreservation schools. With children from other bands of Indians located in this section of California, the Fort Bidwell School can be filled to its capacity. The present location of the school is ideal, there being an excellent farm and an abundance of water for all purposes, including irrigation and some water power.

There is a large amount of reservation work for the superintendent, and an automobile is essential to efficient administrative work.

There are 1,400 acres of pine timberland on the reserve, two-thirds of which is ripe and should be manufactured into lumber, not only for the use of the school plant, but for the use of the Indians in building homes upon their allotments. A considerable portion of the school farm should be cleared for agricultural purposes, and this timber should also be manufactured into lumber. For this purpose a sawmill is necessary.

This department has heretofore recommended that this school be specifically provided for. In the estimates submitted by this department for the proposed bill, making provisions for the entire Indian service, it recommended that $20,000 be given for the support and education of 125 Indian pupils and for repairs and improvements at Fort Bidwell. This estimate, however, was very conservative.

The provisions of the bill proposed by Congresman RAKER are much more liberal, and are justified by the needs of the Indian service in this community, and with the changes suggested I should be glad to see the provisions contained in H. R. 26669 incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill as a specific appropriation for the Fort Bidwell Indian School. If that be impracticable, I trust the bill may receive consideration as a separate measure.

Respectfully, SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Fort Bidwell, Cal., November 25, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RAKER: In furtherance of my letter to you of the 20th instant in answer to your request that I furnish you with complete data relative to the cost of maintenance of this school, and after taking into consideration the cost for the past few years, also the increased attendance this year over former years, I have the honor to submit the following, all of which I know to be conservative:

Cost of employees	$7,660
In addition to above, paid from agency fund	2,100
Annual estimate, clothing, subsistence, and miscellaneous operating expenses	7,101
Open-market purchases, not received on estimate	1,000
Transportation of supplies from railroad	500
Telegraph and telephone expenses	100
Transportation of pupils to and from school (which should be increased to $500)	150
Present cost of upkeep	18,671

The plant is noted for its run-down condition, and, in addition to the above, the following should be made available:

Cement walks (or, if sawmill is allowed, wooden walks; if wood, $1,000 is sufficient)	$3,000
Woven-wire fence	1,000
Irrigation work	500
Farming experiments	300
New school building	10,000
New superintendent's quarters	2,500
Traveling expenses	300
Harvesting, thrashing, and grinding	350
Increase of salaries, as follows:
Superintendent, $1,400 to $1,800	400
Clerk, from $720 to $1,000	280
Financial clerk	600
Automobile, purchase of same	1,200
Sawmill, planer, etc	3,000

Of course, a large part of the last estimate will be only necessary for the first year; after that about $20,000 or $25,000 per year will be ample.

The increase in salaries does not seem exorbitant when we consider that this office is obliged to attend to the school and agency work. The agency work, comprising the allotment of minors, supervising the old Indians, inducing them to start home making on their allotments, determination of heirs by hearings, sale of noncompetent and inherited Indian lands, etc.

I do not mean to take this opportunity to try getting my salary raised, and will be very much pleased if we can get the other things needed, but believe remuneration of self and clerks should be in keeping with services rendered.

P. S.—Hope favorable action will be taken on the request for an automobile for this place.

Yours, very truly, W. A. FULLER, Superintendent.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, at the end of line 22, page 10, by inserting the following: "For support and education of 125 Indian pupils at the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Fort Bidwell, Cal., and for repairs and improvements, $25,251; for new school building, $10,000; for superintendent's cottage, $2,500; for a sawmill, $3,000; in all, $40,751."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment, also.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give me three minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I give three minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the same conditions apply to this school as apply to the others. There are 150 pupils there. At this school there are over 1,200 acres of ripe timber adjoining the school, and that timber requires the construction and erection of a sawmill, to the end that the timber might be used in order that the department might improve the school buildings and at the same time have the lumber and material necessary to build up their allotments, which are scattered over this part of the country. I trust the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Did the gentleman bring all these facts to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is a member of that committee, is he not.

Mr. TILSON. No; I am not.

Mr. RAKER. I supposed the gentleman was.

This is the condition: The appropriation bill was taken up early in the session. I introduced these bills on the first day, December 4, and, of course, it took a few days for the reports to get back to the committee. When the reports came back to the committee this appropriation bill had been reported, and, of course, the committee did not have an opportunity to consider these bills.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As a matter of fact, we did not have any information in regard to these matters before us. Does not the gentleman think he would do well to introduce a bill in the next Congress, the Sixty-third Congress, that would take care of them?

Mr. RAKER. To be honest with the chairman of the committee, the matter has been so thoroughly investigated by the department that I hope that the House will put them on. I feel satisfied that the interests are so urgent that these amendments should go into the Indian appropriation bill. I think the House ought to let them go in.

They are very meritorious. Personally it makes no difference to me, but I know the condition of these Indians. I have a report here from the doctor who has been over that country, and who says a large percentage of them are dying from tuberculosis and the want of care and proper attention. But in this particular case, here are 1,200 acres of ripe timber within a mile of this school that could be sawed and used and the Government property improved, and at the same time lumber could be had for the purpose of building up the allotments of the Indians all over this country nearby, at the same time saving the Government the expense of buying lumber, wood, and so forth, and at the same time conserve the timber that is now going to waste.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the gentleman, but I must insist on my point of order. I do not think his timber will be spoiled by next year.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RAKER. I submit it to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, dated January 2, 1913, and also a letter from the superintendent of the Bidwell Indian School, dated November 25, 1912, and a copy of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have printed the documents which he has indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 550 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., and for pay of superintendent, $94,350; for general repairs and improvements, $10,000; in all, $104,350.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out the words "five hundred and fifty," in line 24, page 10, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seven hundred"; and strike out the figures "94,350," in line 1, page 11, and substitute therefor the figures "110,400"; and in line 2, page 11, strike out the figures "104,350" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "129,400."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. I will withhold it if the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to be heard on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair understood the reading of the amendment correctly, it simply increases the amounts. Will the gentleman state the ground of his point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The ground is that it is new legislation. It increases the different items, does it not?

Mr. RAKER. That is all; just the amounts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I withdraw the point of order and call for a vote. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, there are three separate amendments——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask that the debate on this close in five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I want sufficient time to read the letter——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has offered an amendment and has been recognized and has control of the floor, and can not be interrupted without his consent save on a point of order. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to read a letter from the superintendent in regard to this matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that the department only estimated for 550 pupils?

Mr. RAKER. The department may have asked that, but here is the condition of affairs: Five hundred and fifty pupils are provided for, but the school will accommodate 700 without any more building, without any more expense for fuel, light, water, or general superintendence.

Mr. HAYDEN. Where are you going to get the other 150 Indians?

Mr. RAKER. I will tell you in just a moment. There are over 5,000 Indians close to this school, within a short distance, who are without educational facilities.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that the attendance at that school is only 493? You can not get Indians enough now to fill it. The capacity is now 550 and the attendance only 493.

Mr. RAKER. There are 624 enrolled. The superintendent has been compelled in the last six months to turn away many who are desirous to be admitted to this school, and has been compelled to permit no one to reenter this school in any way, shape, or form. Now, with a school of the capacity of 700, with all the expenses of superintendency, light, heat, equipment, and everything provided, does it not look like a poor piece of economy, when you could provide education, care, and attention for another 150 of these pupils by simply providing the absolutely necessary amount for their provisions and clothing, whereas if you put up another school it will cost you $150,000? Here you can get proper care and attention at an expense of $167 per capita per annum, instead of expending $100,000, as you are doing in these other schools.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Is not the gentleman aware that many of the schools which we are maintaining and appropriating for in this bill have an insufficient number of pupils at present?

Mr. RAKER. They do not show that way from the report.

Mr. MILLER. Any number of them; and if perchance there should be a few who applied at this school who could not be accommodated there they could be at some of these other schools.

Mr. RAKER. Have you found any other school where you can accommodate 150 pupils without any additional expense to the Government, so far as the building, light, heat, superintendance, and general equipment are concerned?

Here you are saving to the Government $100,000 or $150,000 by providing for the Indians, by putting them in this school where you have an equipment provided for instead of building new buildings.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will take the trouble to appear before the committee I think we can point out to him how they can be taken care of.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota must admit that there has not been a meeting that we could appear before except the very first few days of this session.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, the gentleman must not say that, we have had many meetings.

Mr. RAKER. Since the first of the session?

Mr. MILLER. Not since January 1, but we have had many meetings this session.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that, because I have repeatedly asked for a hearing on these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the vote upon this matter is so nearly divided, I do not care to take the further time of the House, but I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a letter, together with the report and recommendation by the Chamber of Commerce of Riverside of December 16, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a certain letter and papers which he has specified. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 23, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: Answering yours of December 26, requesting me to furnish you with information relative to the condition of Sherman Institute and the advisability of increasing the appropriation to provide for an enrollment of 700 pupils, as requested by the Chamber of Commerce of Riverside, Cal., I have to advise you that the present appropriation provides for the support of 550 pupils. We can accommodate 700 pupils with the equipment we now have for 550. It will require no additional buildings for the increased enrollment and we can accommodate this additional number of pupils with the same general running expense for the number now provided for, as there will be practically no extra cost for light, fuel, water, and general superintendence, the only additional cost being the per capita appropriation of $167 for the additional number to be accommodated, or a total increase of $25,050.

A conservative estimate of the cost of a new plant to provide for the additional number of pupils would be $100,000, and it is certainly in the interest of economical administration to increase the enrollment of a school where the appropriation for buildings and equipment for the accommodation of pupils is unnecessary.

There will be no difficulty whatever in securing an enrollment of 700, or even a larger number if we have funds with which to support them. In November I canceled all orders for transportation of pupils and notified superintendents of neighboring reservations that it would be impossible for me to accept more pupils, on account of the school already having more than the number appropriated for, the attendance at that time being 570. In fact, each year during the past three years I have been compelled to refuse the admittance of a large number of applicants, as we did not have funds to support them. This condition, however, need not be surprising to those who understand actual conditions among the Indians of the Southwest. Among the Navajo Indians alone there are fully 5,000 children not in school. There are also approximately 1,000 Papago children without school facilities. The Indian population of California is over 16,000, with approximately 4,000 children of school age, many of whom are not in school.

Realizing the fact that industrial training is of prime importance to the Indian youth, I am laying especial emphasis on this class of work, and hope to make Sherman Institute one of the leading industrial schools. Conditions are most favorable for this training at this school. The city of Riverside and people in the vicinity are in thorough sympathy with the aims of the school, and the splendid opportunities for giving Indian boys and girls of the reservations the advantage of industrial training in the homes and on the ranches of southern California are of great value. In fact, I do not know of any school in the service where these conditions are more favorable. Climatic conditions are of the best, health conditions are good, and, in my opinion, there are the best of reasons for making appropriations for Sherman Institute that are equal to the largest schools of the Indian service.

I desire to invite your attention to the provision in the House bill as reported from the House Committee on Indian Affairs making appropriation of $10,000 for repairs and improvements for Sherman Institute, and to suggest that this should be increased to $15,000. I have repeatedly made recommendation to the Indian Office for $15,000 instead of $10,000 for general repairs and improvements, because it is in the interests of economical administration to keep the plant in good repair rather than to permit it to deteriorate. We have 46 buildings to keep in repair, as well as to keep in good condition the heating, water, sewer, and lighting systems, and $15,000 is a conservative estimate for this purpose.

The department has recommended to Congress $20,000 for new buildings and $15,000 for a heating system. These improvements, however, are not made necessary because of any contemplated increase in enrollment, but to increase the general efficiency of the plant. While I am desirous of obtaining the appropriation of $20,000 for new buildings, as recommended by the department, in order to provide better accommodations for employees, as well as a gymnasium for the students, this appropriation could be delayed for the present if considered absolutely necessary to do so. I am especially desirous of having an appropriation for a central heating plant, because it is in the interests of safety. We now have individual heaters in a number of buildings, which increase the danger of fire, and a central heating plant would be a decided improvement and lessen the danger of fire. In fact, the loss of one of our large dormitories would amount to more than the installation of an entire heating system for the school, and I would be pleased if this appropriation could be made at this time. The appropriation recommended is as follows:

For support and education of 700 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., and for pay for superintendent	$119,400
For general repairs and improvements	15,000
For heating plant	15,000
For new buildings	20,000
Total	169,400

Yours, very truly,

F. M. CONSER, Superintendent.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have received your letter of December 23, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which you inclose a copy of one from the Chamber of Commerce of Riverside, Cal., bearing upon the capacity of the Indian school located in that city.

In accordance with your request the following information is sent you concerning this school:

The rated capacity of this school is 550 pupils and the appropriations for some years past have made provisions for the maintenance of this number of pupils. Sleeping porches have been added to a number of the dormitories; and these can be used the entire year. Counting these, the dormitory capacity of the school is at least 700. The dining room and schoolrooms are also adequate to care for 700 pupils. If the support fund were increased so that it would care for 700 pupils, it would not be necessary to ask for any additional appropriations in the way of new school buildings to care for the additional number of pupils. A new building for employees' quarters is, however, urgently needed at this time. There would be little or no increase in the amount now spent for light, heat, water, and equipments, as the present expenditures for these purposes will provide for 700 almost as well as for 550. The superintendent is not now able to enroll all the pupils who have made application, and it is believed that he would have no difficulty in enrolling 700 pupils were he given authority to do so.

In view of the fact that the plant can now accommodate with its present equipment 700 pupils, it would be in the interest of economy in the expenditure of public funds to authorize the enrollment of 700 pupils, provided Congress would appropriate for the support of this number.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

RIVERSIDE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Riverside, Cal., December 16, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Alturas, Cal.

DEAR SIR: We beg to bring to your notice the fact that, although the equipment of the Sherman Institute in this city provides for the housing and instruction of at least 700 Indian children, the appropriation for maintenance restricts the attendance to 550.

The institute, with its present enrollment, falls far short of meeting the need of the Indians of this district. There are reported to be at least 5,000 Navajo children and nearly 1,000 Papagos entirely without facilities for instruction beyond those afforded by the agency schools, and many of the children are entirely without school facilities. The maximum of enrollment under the present appropriation has already been reached, and reservation superintendents throughout the district have been notified to cease sending pupils in.

We would respectfully ask that you make inquiry concerning Sherman Institute conditions of Supt. F. M. Conser, who is to be in Washington shortly. The appropriations which have been recommended in the correspondence between the institute and the Indian Office are as follows: For support and education of 650 Indian pupils, $111,050; for general repairs and improvements, $15,000; a total of $126,050. Additional improvements are badly needed and would involve a further expense as follows: Heating system, $20,000; outside toilet facilities, $15,000; employees' quarters, $20,000; gymnasium, $20,000.

During the past years we have had abundant opportunity to observe the work being done at Sherman, and we believe the institution to be conducted in an exceedingly efficient way, our only regret being, as stated above, that the maintenance allowance keeps the number of pupils from 100 to 150 below the number which the dormitories and classrooms can conveniently accommodate. It seems to us that so expensive a plant ought to be run at its full capacity.

Respectfully, yours,

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
H. M. MAY, Secretary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be authorized to change the totals wherever it may be found necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to change the totals wherever found necessary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, together with the amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, for three days, to attend a funeral.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall not exceed two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and the other half by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas a question? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] desired to obtain an hour on this bill if it did not come up to-day. If the gentleman from Iowa desires the time to-morrow, can not it be arranged?

Mr. MURDOCK. I suppose it can with the gentleman from Tennessee. There has been only one request for debate on this side, and that was for less than an hour.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman make the request, so that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] can have an extra hour, if he desires it, to-morrow?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What does the gentleman from Iowa want to talk about—the bill?

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I assume not.

Mr. MURDOCK. If we can agree on three hours' general debate, an hour and a half on each side, I think that would take care of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MANN. Yes; if he could get the hour.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say that I would give him an hour.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to three hours' general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to three hours, an hour and a half to be controlled by himself and the other hour and a half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask if the first reading be now dispensed with, what is the intention of the gentleman from Tennessee—to move that the committee rise, or proceed with the general debate to-night?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it is desired, and the gentleman from Iowa wants to put in his hour he can have the time now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa is not here to-day.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I shall ask the House to remain but a short time to-night.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to dispense with the first reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think the most important question now confronting our Nation is, Whether we should submit to arbitration the dispute which has arisen with Great Britain concerning the Panama Canal tolls.

Congress during its last session provided in the Panama Canal bill that the vessels of the United States engaged in coastwise trade might pass through the canal without paying tolls. England claims that such an exemption is a discrimination in favor of our shipping, which is prohibited by our treaty with her. Whether or not her claim is just I do not propose now to discuss. I wish to confine myself to the one proposition that, regardless of our opinion of the merits of the question, whether we think her interpretation is right or ours is right, we ought to recognize that neither nation is so disinterested as to be able to judge of it impartially and that the isue should be submitted to arbitration.

This question is momentous, because it compels us in the face of an interested and critical world to disclose whether we will follow the path of profit or the path of honor; whether we have as a nation a real devotion to high ideals or whether we only advocate them in the hour of ease and desert them in the hour of trial. We have for years professed ourselves earnest advocates of arbitration. We have been the foremost to urge that war was irrational and that peaceful tribunals should gradually replace and abolish it. Our strength and wealth and isolation have relieved our advocacy from any imputation of fear or cowardice, and we have plumed ourselves that by our leadership and example we were advancing in the world the rule of reason and lessening the sway of brute force. Now our sincerity is put to the test. We can almost hear the voice of conscience say, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." And it is important not only to us, to our reputation, to our future influence, but it is important to the cause of arbitration, that we, its special promoter and champion, should not forsake it at the very first moment when it runs counter to our selfish interests. We have claimed to favor it because it was intrinsically fair and just, and ought to be ashamed to abandon it because we find it momentarily expensive and inconvenient.

I am aware that there is a fraction of our people who instinctively oppose arbitration—especially arbitration with England. There are some people who believe that occasional bloodletting is good for a nation, that without constant training for war we should become weaklings. There are others who believe that we are so strong and resourceful that no nation will ever dare to fight us, and that consequently we can safely do what we please and take what we want without fear of challenge, and that it would be foolish for us to renounce such a profitable irresponsibility in order to promote general justice and happiness. There is a still larger class who think little about the subject abstractly, but when any concrete case arises will always spring to the side that shows them a profit or an advantage and ignore a side which offers only justice. But the great body of thoughtful citizens—those who ultimately make public opinion—in their calm moments are genuinely anxious that their country shall do right. They appreciate the value of a good reputation to a man or a nation. But, more than that, they love uprightness, they prefer the rule of a judicial tribunal to the rule of the sword, and they wish their country to steadily lead in the movement toward international arbitration and peace regardless of the result on their immediate interests.

That sentiment, dormant but dominant, needs, I think, to assert itself at the present juncture. It is not a crisis which threatens war. Neither Great Britain nor the United States would deliberately sever our friendly relations because of this insignificant commercial gain or loss, although history gives many instances where differences as slight have engendered heat enough to ultimately inflame a war. But should we ignore England's contention because the incident is too trifling to provoke her into war? Is not that rather a reason why we should give her claims fair and courteous treatment? And what does that involve? Unquestionably a submission to The Hague or some other judicial tribunal, which for years we have urged was the proper resort for such disputes, which was established largely at our instance, and whose jurisdiction we have persistently sought to enlarge. And if this moral obligation to submit to its decision is not enough, we have the legal and technical obligation that by a solemn treaty with Great Britain we have agreed in advance to submit just this class of questions to arbitration. Why is there any doubt as to our action? I think it is only because the American people have not as yet given the subject sufficient attention to understand the conditions. For what public opinion decrees Congress will surely perform. If public opinion on this question becomes positive and outspoken, there is no danger that it will not be obeyed.

But I fear the view of the people to-day is only superficial. We built the canal, they say, with our money. We are to be at the expense of operating and defending it. Shall we not do as we please with our own? Are we not to be allowed to operate it for our profit? Must our vessels pay for the use of it? If so, why did we build it? Natural questions, and which, if unanswered, seem to justify us and put England in the wrong. Let us, then, consider briefly the facts.

In 1850, when both Great Britain and the United States were anxious to have the canal built, but were jealous of each other's influence in Central America, the two nations made a formal agreement which was intended to settle permanently all disputes which might grow out of the canal and was known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The plan was that the two nations should together protect the canal whenever and wherever built and together guarantee its neutrality, and that it should be open on equal terms to all nations who wished to join in its protection. One of the agreements was that neither nation should ever alone control the canal or fortify it or exercise any dominion over the territory through which it ran. So when, 20 years ago, upon the failure of the French canal, the United States began to seriously consider the project, we were confronted by this treaty, which bound us not to prosecute it alone. To get rid of that impediment was the first requisite step, and so we commenced negotiations with Great Britain, which finally resulted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, which expressly stated that it was framed to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to remove the obstacle which that treaty presented to the United States constructing the canal alone. So we must bear in mind that up to 1901 we had bound ourselves not to build any canal except in cooperation with Great Britain, and that we were the ones who sought the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in order to release ourselves from that obligation.

But in order to obtain that right and get from England that release we were compelled to make certain promises and agreements. Those are the restrictions which hamper us in our control of the canal now. Except for them we should be free to use and maintain the canal as we please and levy tolls regardless of any other nation. But it was necessary for us to submit to these limitations, in order to escape from our old agreement not to build the canal at all alone. And though it seems at first blush unreasonable that we, who have been at the enormous expense of construction, should not have a free hand in operation, yet we must remember that we voluntarily submitted to these restrictions in order to get released from our previous agreement. Whether we made a good bargain then, whether we might not have negotiated better if we had clearly foreseen all the problems which arise now, is not the question. We thought then the bargain was satisfactory, and we bound ourselves to it, and that, I think, is the phase which the people do not generally understand. They do not appreciate that we had agreed not to build the canal alone; that to get rid of that agreement we entered into a new treaty, and that new treaty contained the restrictions which are now perplexing and troubling us. We sought that treaty; it was entered into to allow us to build the canal, and though we may find provisions in it which now embarrass us and do not allow us the freedom which seems natural and right, yet I do not see how anyone who understands it can contend that we must not strictly obey the provisions of this treaty which we ourselves sought and needed.

It is over the true meaning of some of these provisions that we and England are now at variance. And the proper place for their interpretation is a court of justice; not the legislative body of either of the interested parties. Now and then the claim is suggested that England in many ways violated the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and therefore we had and still have the right to claim that it was void and no longer bound us. On that ground some American statesmen were disposed, 15 years ago, instead of negotiating with England for its repeal, to begin building the canal without any regard to England's rights and objections, and some still suggest that as we were not really bound by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we need not consider ourselves bound by its successor. That position is utterly untenable. It may be that Great Britain had so disregarded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we had once a right to avoid it. That is a question open to argument. But two Secretaries of State of two different political parties, each a man of ability and courage and patriotism, each anxious to maintain all the rights of his own country, but each conscious that he was the guardian and representative not only of his country's rights, but of his country's honor, both of these men, Richard Olney and John Hay, investigating the subject under that deep responsibility, came to the conclusion that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in full force and that it was necessary for us to secure from England our release before we could honorably undertake the canal alone. And the United States, acting upon that conclusion, has formally admitted the force of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and expressly sanctioned the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in its place. So that it is too late now, if it was ever possible, to claim that we were not bound by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, inasmuch as we have admitted its validity and agreed formally upon a substitute.

Having then purchased back from England the right to build and own the canal by ourselves, which we had once given away, we are limited in our conduct by the terms of this purchase. And while it may at times seem to us unfair, and we may fret at the necessity of giving up some cherished purpose, because it runs counter to our agreement, yet I think that no honest American would wish that Congress should legislate in palpable violation of our treaty, no matter how it might affect our commercial interests. And if Congress should enact provisions for the benefit of our merchant marine which Great Britain should claim violated the treaty, then I think it is equally clear and imperative that we, who have prided ourselves on our faith in arbitration, who have pressed it upon other nations almost at the point of the bayonet, should now, without hesitation, submit the true meaning and construction of this treaty to a judicial tribunal.

This is the point to which I have been leading and with which I am most concerned, for it is the point of danger. What is the true construction of the present treaty I do not wish to argue. Whether the contention of Great Britain or of the United States is correct I for the moment ignore. I only insist that as long as there is this difference of opinion between the two nations, no matter how confident we may be that we are right or how fearful we may be that we are wrong, we ought to agree instantly and cheerfully to submit it to arbitration. Great Britain claims that by the terms of the treaty we are forbidden to exempt even our coastwise trade from payment of tolls. We have in the canal bill provided for such exemption. And already we hear and read mutterings that this is not a case for arbitration; that we should let England do what she can about it; and that as it only affects our private internal policy England has no right to interfere. Many influential interests are concerned. The business of great States and cities is deeply affected, and strong, selfish forces will be enlisted to keep conditions as they are and allow no change by either legislation or arbitration. And, unless the people understand the situation and the agreements which have led up to it, they will be apt to say, "Why arbitrate a matter of our own concern? Can we not collect such tolls as we please from our own canal?" But it is a matter peculiarly within the scope of arbitration, for it is simply the interpretation of a treaty. And what I wish to impress and emphasize is that, whether our interpretation is right, or England's is right, whether the weight of argument is on our side or on hers, whichever is likely to be the final loser, inasmuch as there is a difference of opinion—a fair ground for dispute—we are bound by our principles and our precedents and our belief in international arbitration to submit the question to the decision of a court. The interpretation of a treaty is one of the especially enumerated items which our arbitration treaty with Great Britain binds us to submit to The Hague tribunal. But, regardless of that explicit treaty agreement, our respect for the principle of arbitration should lead us to volunteer it here, and not greedily and stubbornly insist upon our claims because we think England will not make war about them. Such conduct we would condemn and despise in others. I hope we shall not be so self-deceived, so unprincipled, and so shortsighted as to adopt it ourselves.

Of course, those who do not believe in the principle of international arbitration, who would like to see it checked and discountenanced, who believe in—

> The good old plan,
> That they should take who have the power
> And they should keep who can—will argue that we ought to stand by what we think are our rights and allow no one to interfere or arbitrate. Those who are obsessed by a blind hatred of England will take the same side. But the great body of people who in recent years have hailed the progress of international arbitration as the opening of a better era for the world will recognize that here is an opportunity for us to show the sincerity and disinterestedness of our professions.

We are told all Europe would be prejudiced against us and we could not obtain impartial judges. I believe the judges of The Hague tribunal would honestly attempt to isolate their minds and judgments from local prejudice or favoritism and interpret the treaty as a question of pure law. But certainly their disinterestedness would be greater than that of the political leaders and newspapers who are now urging that we refuse arbitration because it would go against us. Congress in passing this legislation for the benefit of our coastwise trade and in now claiming that it does not violate the treaty is certainly not disinterested. I would rather submit to arbitration and be beaten than by rejecting arbitration discredit that whole movement and give cause to suspect that our advocacy of it was only for cases where we thought we should win. If we were compelled by the court to pay a substantial award, that money loss would be forgotten in a few years, while our refusal to arbitrate would give a setback to a noble cause whose effect might be felt for a generation.

There are three courses open to the United States. One is to repeal the provision exempting our coastwise trade from tolls, which England complains of as injurious to her commerce and a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. A large minority of Congress opposed that provision on its merits and think it will be harmful instead of beneficial to the United States. Or, secondly, we can let the law stand and agree with England to submit to a judicial tribunal whether it was in violation of the treaty. If the court should find in our favor, no action would be necessary; but if the court should interpret the treaty to mean as England claims, that any exemption to our coastwise trade from tolls also exempted from tolls certain vessels of other nations, then we should be obliged to refund to such foreign vessels whatever tolls we had collected from them. Or, thirdly, we might do what is being urged as the true American course, decline to change the law, decline to arbitrate, and leave Great Britain to find such remedy as she can in peace or war.

I sincerely trust that will not prove to be the American course. It is in immediate results the selfish and advantageous course, as it follows simply our own inclinations and hopes of profit; and it will be urged that it is the spirited, courageous course, and that we must not allow other nations to interfere with our legislation. It will be easy also, by appealing to old memories to arouse hostile feeling toward Great Britain, for to go no further back than the Civil War no one can recall her conduct then in the hour of our trial and weakness without hot indignation and a thirst for revenge. But I hope another age has come and that in our relations toward all nations we shall feel that we are strong and magnanimous enough to bury past injuries and resentments and settle differences by the scale of even-handed justice. I hope the American people will feel that no selfish interest like our coastwise trade should tempt us from the path on which we have so deliberately entered of settling international disputes and especially the interpretation of treaties by courts of arbitration. In this particular instance we might gain by forsaking our principles, but I think the precedent would cost far more than the momentary profit. We should lose in character and self-respect, and they are of value to a nation as to a man.

I intended when I commenced not to consider any controverted issue, but to confine myself to showing that the dispute between England and the United States was clearly one for arbitration and that it would be disgraceful in us to refuse it.

There is one phase of the subject, however, which I have not seen discussed and which seems to me of such advantage to us that I can not refrain from alluding to it.

The treaty provides that the canal shall be "free and open to vessels of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic," and England contends that for us to exempt our coastwise steamers from paying tolls puts them on an inequality, while we claim that the phrase "all nations" does not include the United States, so that the requirement of equality does not apply to us. Into that controversy I shall not enter. But suppose, instead of exempting our vessels from paying tolls, we give back to them by way of subsidy what they have paid in tolls. That would be of exactly the same effect to our vessels—it would be exactly the same to the United States Treasury. But would it be the same as a matter of law in violating the treaty? I think not. It is certainly not a technical, literal violation of the treaty, because it does not conflict with the canal being free and open to all nations alike, which is what the treaty exacts. The tolls and conditions provided by the regulations would still be exactly the same for all nations. That is admitted in the English note. Then, if paying back the tolls does not violate the letter of the treaty, would it violate its spirit? Again I think not. The spirit is that all nations should be exactly on the same footing. All other nations certainly have the right to pay back to their own ships, in form of subsidy, the amount collected as tolls. Some nations have done it in the Suez Canal, from whose regulations ours were copied, and I understand Spain has already undertaken to do it for our canal. So that whether we do it or not if that constitutes an inequality there is certain to be inequality, for some nations are sure to subsidize. So for us to refrain from subsidizing would not produce equality. Indeed the only possibility of equality would be for every nation, including ourselves, to subsidize to the amount of the tolls and then all would be on terms of exact equality. Since, then, there can not be such equality, because some nations are sure to subsidize and some will not, it is obvious that that is not what was meant by the term "equality" in the treaty, because subsidizing by other nations would produce the same inequality as subsidizing by the United States. No one disputes the right of other nations to subsidize; when the treaty was made no one doubted it would occur, and therefore the right of the United States to subsidize, which would only produce the same kind of inequality, is clear. Consequently the inequality or discrimination produced by a nation subsidizing its own vessels was not intended to be prohibited and is no violation of the purpose of the treaty.

Therefore the United States has the right, both under the letter and the spirit of the law, to pay back to its vessels the tolls collected. Inasmuch as that would accomplish exactly the same result and would greatly strengthen our argument I think it would be wise to amend our law accordingly.

And there would follow another result from such a change which would still further strengthen our case. The treaty provides that all tolls shall be fair and equitable. It might be claimed by Great Britain that in determining what was a fair return on the investment, tolls on American vessels should be calculated. Otherwise foreign vessels would have to pay higher tolls in order to produce the reasonable income. All basis for such a claim and argument would be taken away if the law provided that American vessels should pay the same tolls as others, although they were repaid in the form of subsidies.

The only objection I can see is that many Members of Congress hate the word "subsidy," and while they are perfectly willing to vote for the result, shrink from voting for the name. But when it would so vastly fortify our position before a court, I hope they would conquer their scruples. I suppose England would still claim that it was a violation of the treaty, as she suggests in her note that it would be only a technical compliance. But I think that it conforms to the spirit as well as the letter. The mere fact that it accomplishes indirectly what is forbidden directly does not prove that it is illegal. There are innumerable instances of such validity. The most familiar to us is when the United States protects private lands from overflow by levees. A law authorizing that directly would be unconstitutional and void, but we constantly effect the same result by appropriating to improve the navigation of a stream, and while the result is the same the legality is entirely different. In this case, while the result is the same the process is different, and both the process and result are quite within the law, for the process is legal because not prohibited by the treaty and the result is legal for it was anticipated by the makers of the treaty and was inevitable.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that subject, will he yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman believe Great Britain would be satisfied with that arrangement, if we, by a subterfuge of that kind, did exactly what England is objecting to?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not suppose England would be satisfied, but I do think that if we submitted it to a court of arbitration our position before that court would be a great deal stronger than it would be if we left the law as it is to-day.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman admits that we have not gotten one peg ahead, if we make a law, by the provisions of which we give a subsidy to each vessel equal to the toll that vessel would pay.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes. As I say, it accomplishes the same result, but I think it accomplishes it in a manner which is far more likely to be held to be legal and not in violation of the treaty than the existing law.

There is one other point to which I wish to allude. In the discussion of our obligation to arbitrate under the treaty of 1908 with Great Britain, I have seen no allusion to an exception which may cover this case. That treaty provides that we shall refer all differences arising out of the interpretation of treaties to the Hague Court "provided they do not concern the interests of third parties." It is possible that a decision in this case would affect not only Great Britain but all other nations whose ships had passed through the canal and paid tolls, for the decision of the court, if it held that the exemption of our vessels from payment was a discrimination and illegal, might involve our reimbursing to all other vessels the tolls we had collected from them so that they should be on an equality with ours. Consequently if it concerns the interest of third parties we might not be under direct treaty obligation with Great Britain to submit this case to arbitration. But I think it still would be our duty to show our faith in the principle of judicial settlement and offer to submit it to a court with jurists from nations like Switzerland, sure to be impartial, or to such a tribunal as determined the Alaskan boundary dispute. The matter of importance is not so much the result or the method as that we should now in this matter of international concern prove that we are ready to abide by our national doctrine of arbitration.

It is worth something to earn the reputation of standing by your agreements and your principles regardless of results. I do not believe our reputation with the world at large is as good as we deserve. I suspect that if we saw ourselves as other nations see us we should not be proud of the portrait. Foreign casual observers must have their attention attracted and their opinions formed mainly by the sensational incidents of our life. They must think of us as the Nation of homicides, where more murders are committed than in any other country called civilized; where mobs are constantly taking the law into their own hands with an atrocity that is inhuman; where trains are held up by bandits; where the police of our best known city, instead of defenders of the law, become its most frightful violators; where the heads of labor organizations, supposed to be the stalwart champions of the common people against oppression, combine to perpetrate the most dastardly and incredible outrages. These are some of the headlines which must catch the eye and bias the judgments of foreign readers. We know that behind these surface indications there is a depth of orderly, self-restrained, law-respecting public opinion which controls and determines the policy of this country; which believes in justice and fair play no matter who suffers from it; which knows that any violation of law or of treaty or of principle, because of momentary self-interest, works a deeper harm and a more permanent injury to the character and self-respect of the Nation than can be compensated by any material gain.

To that public opinion I appeal. I ask it to say firmly and decisively that inasmuch as England represents that one clause of our legislation violates our agreement with her and injures her, we should willingly either repeal the law or arbitrate the question whether it does violate the treaty, and cheerfully abide any decision by the tribunal. Not only our conscience, our honor, our pride demand that decision, but it might even be argued that an enlightened and farsighted self-interest also demand it; that despite our strength and isolation we need for our vast and growing foreign trade the respect and confidence and friendliness of other nations, which might easily be forfeited by our conduct here; that having every advantage in the competitions of peace any step toward the abolition of war makes directly to our gain. But I prefer to rest the case on the firmer and higher ground that regardless of interest our self-respect demands it. It ought to be enough for us that our treaty agreement and our settled policy alike require us to submit the question to arbitration. When that is clearly understood, I believe public opinion, the people, and the Congress will all be of one mind.

The President has recently declared publicly and unequivocally that he favors arbitration, but the efforts of this administration in that direction have more than once been blocked by the Senate. I hope it may not happen again. I hope the voice of public opinion will respond to his appeal so earnestly and unanimously that further opposition will be checked and the United States will take another upward step toward the rule of reason, the supremacy of law, and the reign of peace and good will among men. Such action would confirm our honorable position among the nations as the disinterested champion of arbitration, and would confound our critics and be worthy of ourselves. We are about to celebrate a hundred years of peace with Great Britain. How better can we celebrate it than by such an arbitration, which of itself would tend to make that peace perpetual.

We can help now to realize the noble aspiration voiced by Charles Sumner three-quarters of a century ago:

> Let us lay a new stone in the grand temple of universal peace, whose dome shall be as lofty as the firmament of heaven, as broad and comprehensive as the earth itself.

[Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph placed in the Post Office appropriation bill now under consideration for the benefit of the substitute letter carriers and post-office clerks is one that I sincerely hope and trust will meet with the hearty approval of every Member of this body. I have had occasion to give considerable thought and study to this branch of the postal service and have repeatedly called the attention of the Members of this House to the deplorable condition surrounding the employment of these substitutes. Knowing, as I do, the great handicap under which these men labor, I have often wondered why so many capable and efficient young men would make the sacrifices that they have in order to continue in the postal service. It is true that I have seen many capable and efficient young men who have taken the examination and received appointments to the substitute force give up their places in disgust after serving a short period of time.

It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is our duty to legislate in a way that will tend to improve our public service, and one of the first requisites to perfect any business is to have competent and efficient employees. This is the policy pursued by the managers of every institution employing large numbers of men, but I venture the opinion that if the postal service was managed as a private institution the substitute service would have to be made far more inviting than it is at the present time before competent men could be induced to do the work. We all know that it is the glamour of the public service that acts as an inducement for so many young and ambitious men to enter it, and they will often put up with almost intolerable conditions in order to continue as employees of the Government.

The average earnings of these substitutes are not sufficient to maintain body and soul together, and it is only the possibility of receiving a regular appointment, with its attendant increases in salary each year until the maximum grade is reached, that acts as an inducement for many of them to continue. I stated in my remarks of April 12, 1912, when the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration, that, to my mind, the position should be abolished altogether if the men were to be required to perform service under the present conditions. I believe it would be better for the Government if these men were to receive a regular salary during the time they serve as substitutes, and that the entrance salary after the substitute period has been served should be based in accordance with the time served as such substitute. In other words, if a man served as a substitute for a period of one year, his entrance salary should be $800; if he served as a substitute for a period of two years, his entrance salary should be $900; and if he served as a substitute for a period of three or more years, his entrance salary should be $1,000 per annum.

However, I am extremely gratified to know that the Post Office Committee has given so much attention to this very worthy branch of our postal service, and I congratulate the committee and the distinguished chairman from Tennessee for giving the House an opportunity to vote on this question. I shall vote in favor of this legislation because I believe it is just and equitable and is for the best interest of the public service. Knowing, as I do, the merit that it contains, I appeal to my colleagues who have not had an opportunity to give this question the same study that I have to sustain the committee and enact this legislation into law.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

TWENTIETH INTERNATIONAL IRRIGATION CONGRESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of resolutions adopted by the Twentieth International Irrigation Congress, held at Salt Lake City, Utah, October 3, 1912. I ask that the resolutions lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions of the Twentieth International Irrigation Congress, adopted at Salt Lake City, Utah, October 3, 1912.

We, the delegates to the Twentieth International Irrigation Congress, assembled in Salt Lake City, State of Utah, extend cordial greetings to the irrigation host throughout our country, and submit the following resolutions as a declaration of principles:

1. We hold that Federal control as between the States is essential to the equitable distribution and utilization of the water of interstate streams.

2. We approve the development of navigation throughout the rivers and lakes of the United States in accordance with the most comprehensive plan.

3. We renew our indorsement of the Newlands river regulation bill, and urge its enactment by the Federal Congress during the coming session. This bill provides for the complete control of the flood waters of our rivers in such way as to promote irrigation and drainage, the development of power, the extension of navigation, and the protection of the lowlands from destructive floods.

4. We heartily approve the Federal forestry policy, and favor its continuance and extension, and commend the cooperation of State and Federal authority in the work of forest protection.

5. We recognize the establishment of the United States Reclamation Service as second only in importance to the passing of the reclamation act in the development of the arid West. Experience has demonstrated the expediency of certain administrative changes:

5a. We believe the law should be so amended as to require that all contracts for the sale of power developed by, or in connection with, any reclamation project shall be approved by the Project Water Users' Association under such project having an interest in such contract.

5b. We believe that the profits arising from the operation of any project should be covered into the reclamation fund to the credit of such project.

5c. We favor the establishment of water users' associations under all Government projects when 20 per cent of the land thereunder shall have passed into private ownership.

5d. We recommend that complete plans and specifications of any work contemplated on any project should be delivered to the Project Water Users' Association before such work is begun, and that itemized semiannual reports of all charges and expenditures under each reclamation project should be furnished to the officers of the water users' association under such project, and we favor the appointment of a consulting engineer under each project, to be selected by and paid by the Project Water Users' Association having access to the plans, specifications, and accounts, but without supervisory power.

6. We commend the work of the United States Geological Survey, and strongly recommend that more liberal appropriations be made by the Federal Congress and the legislatures of the States for cooperation in the prosecution of the work of the topographic and water resources branches of this bureau.

7. We commend the irrigation and drainage investigations of experiment stations, the soil and water investigations of the Bureau of Soils, and dry-farming investigations of the United States Department of Agriculture, and equally commend the work of the agricultural experiment stations and engineering departments in the several States; we favor further investigation of natural subirrigation and of irrigation by pumping; and we urge more liberal appropriations by the Federal Congress and by the States for the work and cooperation of these agencies, and for the more general distribution of the reports and bulletins recording their operations and results.

8. We believe that the administration of the Carey Act can be made more effective by the establishment of effective State supervision for all projects undertaken in any such States.

9. We deprecate the sale of abandoned military posts for wholly inadequate prices, and recommend their transfer to the States in which they may be situated for use as agricultural schools, experiment stations, or other public uses.

10. We recommend that the Congress of the United States rescind its action relative to the payment of expenses of Government officers and employees in attending sessions of the Irrigation Congress, in so far as the same relates to experts whose work bears a relation to the purposes of this congress.

11. Realizing that the opening of the Panama Canal in 1914 will greatly increase the influx of immigrants by permitting their landing on the Pacific as well as the Atlantic coast, and that the greatest benefits of foreign immigration can be attained only when the immigrants settle permanently on farms where they can quickly develop the spirit of citizenship and help to render this a Nation of homes; we commend cooperation among the various State officers in the establishment of common agencies, including expositions and other means of diffusing accurate information, to the end that immigrants may be located on the land under conditions suitable to their habits and conducive to the best development of the country.

12. We also recommend to the legislative bodies and to the various commercial organizations, particularly of the States west of the Rocky Mountains, the establishment and maintenance of bureaus at those Pacific coast ports where the immigrants will land, and where accurate information concerning agricultural lands and conditions can be supplied to them.

13. We further recommend that the Congress of the United States create a commission to investigate and report upon the colonization systems now in vogue in other countries concerning rural settlement as well as the methods of cooperative farm loan systems.

14. Resolved, That the International Irrigation Congress cooperate to the fullest extent with the Panama-California Exposition in producing at San Diego in 1915 the most elaborate and comprehensive international irrigation exhibit that has ever been assembled; that we invoke the aid of the legislators of the several States from the western part of the Union and of the Governments of all foreign countries interested in irrigation, to the end that this plan may be successfully consummated.

15. We invite the attention of the president and directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition to the propriety of making provision for an adequate exhibit of irrigated farm products from the several irrigated States at the San Francisco Exposition to be held in 1915.

16. The Twentieth International Irrigation Congress proffers its sincere thanks to the State of Utah and to the city of Salt Lake, including the citizens and the Commercial Club and other organizations thereof, for the generous welcome and gracious hospitality extended to its members. The Irrigation Congress has felt at home in the city of its nativity. Its hearty thanks are tendered to Prof. J. J. McClellan and to Prof. Evan Stephens and to the Tabernacle choir for the inspiring music which graced the opening session of the congress. Especial thanks are extended to the Western Union Telegraph Co. for the unusual interest taken in advertising the congress throughout the United States and foreign countries and for special wire and messenger service afforded the congress.

Cordial thanks are extended to the Saltair Railroad and Emigration Canyon Railway for the pleasant excursions tendered to the members of the congress, and to the press of Salt Lake City for its interesting and complete reports of our proceedings. The congress is to be congratulated upon the presence at this session of the accredited delegates from the United Commonwealth of Australia, from the United States of Mexico, from the Republic of Brazil, from the Republic of Portugal, from the Republic of Guatemala, from the Provinces of Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia, Dominion of Canada. We bespeak for future sessions of the congress addresses by eminent authorities on irrigation from these and other nations, to the end that the congress may become the clearing house for the exchange of the most advanced ideas of all nations upon subjects pertaining to irrigation.

We commend our distinguished president, Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, for his inspiring leadership and his impartial conduct in the chair. We commend Mr. Arthur Hooker for his untiring services as secretary of the congress. The Utah Board of Control is entitled to the thanks of all for the splendid success which has attended its preparations for the Twentieth Irrigation Congress.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 7498) fixing the punishment for cruelty to or abandonment of animals in the District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report (No. 1094) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Montesano, Wash., praying for an appropriation for the fortification of Grays and Willapa Harbors in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913, and I submit a report (No. 1095) thereon. This is not a very long measure, and it is of some importance. It should be promptly acted on, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 3, after the words "said period," to insert "fixing fares to be charged for the use of the same"; and on page 2, line 7, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and in such other manner as the commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That $23,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts, is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from the 28th of February to the 10th of March, 1913, both inclusive. Said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property and fixing fares by public conveyance, and to make special regulations respecting the standing, movements, and operating of vehicles of whatever character or kind during said period and fixing fares to be charged for the use of the same. Such regulations shall be in force one week prior to said inauguration, during said inauguration, and one week subsequent thereto, and shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia and in such other manner as the commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of any of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and in default of payment thereof to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby likewise appropriated, to be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for the construction, maintenance, and expenses incident to the operation of temporary public comfort stations and information booths during the period aforesaid.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington having charge of the joint resolution if the rates referred to apply only to the inauguration week?

Mr. JONES. That is the time they apply to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COL. RICHARD H. WILSON.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, yesterday during the morning hour I could not be here. I should like to have been here, but it was impossible, when the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported to the Senate favorably a substitute for the bill (S. 7515) for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army. That measure was thoroughly investigated by the Senator from Wyoming and was unanimously recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a small bill, which pertains to a local matter in Montana, and it is very urgent. The Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] can vouch for the urgency of it. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 7515. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask what is the nature of the bill and of the urgency?

Mr. MYERS. The nature of it is this: Col. Wilson was in charge of Fort William Henry Harrison at Helena, Mont. The sum of about $7,000—the exact sum is disclosed by the substitute reported—was stolen from the safe in the paymaster's office while Col. Wilson was temporarily in charge. It was stolen, it appears, by a couple of men who were deserters and have not been captured.

There was an investigation and Col. Wilson was thoroughly exonerated. Technically, I understand, under the law he is responsible for this money, but the War Department recommended that a bill be introduced and passed relieving him from that obligation.

All the facts are known to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from Delaware being the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. After investigating it and knowing the facts, they recommended the passage of the bill, and it was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator if the report has been printed? I do not find it on my file.

Mr. MYERS. It was made yesterday. I suppose it has been printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It does not seem to have been yet printed.

Mr. MYERS. I ask to have it read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Not the bill, but the report.

Mr. MYERS. I ask to have the report read.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I think this is like a great many other bills. I am somewhat familiar with it. I would like to have it go over. I must object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. MYERS. I must say that if the bill has to take the regular course, I see no hope of its getting through at this session. I have no hope of the bill getting through the Senate and the House if it must take its regular course.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is a measure that I think ought to be considered before it is passed.

Mr. MYERS. I have asked to have it considered now, but, of course, I will have to wait.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 8058) providing for an increase of salary of the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 8068) granting an increase of pension to Annie S. Aul (with accompanying papers); and

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 8070) granting a pension to Iselo Nicely;

A bill (S. 8071) granting a pension to Daniel Hand; and

A bill (S. 8072) granting an increase of pension to William Holdaway (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 8073) repealing a provision of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," and for other purposes, approved August 24, 1912; to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment proposing to reduce the number of clerks of class 2 in the Office of the Surgeon General from 26 to 24, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I offer the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, 1913, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF ANTITRUST LAW.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a bill proposing to amend the Sherman antitrust law, giving the States an opportunity to seek redress for trade restraint. I ask that the brief accompanying the bill be printed in connection therewith, and that it, together with the bill, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 8065) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, was, with the accompanying paper, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SMOOT. Was there a unanimous-consent agreement just entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was. It was just agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there are a number of Senators out of the Chamber who did not expect it to come up at this time. I was in my seat, and if I had heard it read I would have objected to the unanimous-consent agreement. I therefore ask that it be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is beyond the power of the Senate. The Chair may be mistaken in that view, but the Chair thinks that it is beyond the power of the Senate to change or interfere with a unanimous-consent agreement after it is made.

Mr. SMOOT. I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee, for the Senator knows there are a number of Senators who are deeply interested in the bill and desire to speak on it. A number of them have so stated. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee ought, when but a few Senators are in their seats, ask unanimous consent to agree to vote upon a measure that he knows there is objection to. My attention was diverted for the moment by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and we were discussing a question of public business. If I had heard the request read, I would not have agreed to it unless the Senators who are interested in the measure were present and agreed to the unanimous-consent agreement. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw the request under the circumstances.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand the rule of the Senate, it can only be reconsidered by unanimous consent, not by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. It can be withdrawn by the Senator who made the request.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SANDERS. I see on the floor of the Senate as many Members as there are usually here, and I have been bringing this matter up from day to day. There is no snap judgment about it in any sort of way.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never yet in the history of the Senate, since I have been here, known of a Senator asking for a unanimous-consent agreement when he knew there were absent certain Senators who had made objections before, and when the fact of their absence was called to his attention insisted upon it. I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee now to adhere to that rule.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I want to explain that some of the Senators who have objected to the agreement in the past have since then told me that they would not further object. So I do not think the point is well taken with reference to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was in the Chamber, and I intended, at the request of a number of Senators, to object to it in their absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair say a word. There is too much confusion in the Senate. This unanimous-consent offer was made, was read very clearly and with great deliberation by the Secretary, and stated with deliberation by the Chair. The trouble is there is too much confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit this: I was sitting in my seat at the time the order was presented talking to the Senator from Arkansas upon a question that is of interest not only to him but to the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee knows that there are a great many Senators who have stated that they did not want to agree upon a date for a vote on this bill until they had spoken upon it. I would have objected if I had heard the request made, for the reason that I have already stated to the Senator. I do not believe there was ever in the history of the Senate a unanimous-consent agreement secured in this way, and I therefore ask the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw his request.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I want to confirm, if confirmation is necessary, the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I think to take advantage of the circumstance by which his attention was diverted from something that he deliberately intended to object to would be to make an unfair application of an incident that was not due to his fault. By virtue of his position as chairman of one of the committees of the Senate it became necessary for me to address an inquiry to him. The order of business under which the Senate was proceeding was the introduction of bills. I observed certain Senators on their feet with bills in their hands, which indicated to me that that order of business would continue for some minutes; but it suddenly came to an end, and this matter was disposed of without the knowledge of the Senator from Utah or of mine. I say to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] that I think it would be unfair to take advantage of a circumstance that was not due to inattention or to indifference of the particular Senator who had it in his mind to object to unanimous consent with reference to the consideration of that matter. I should feel disposed to go to some length to see that he did not succeed in taking advantage of the incident if it were necessary to do so.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WORKS. It seems to me that no injustice can result from this order if it continues in force. There are 10 days left to discuss this question between now and the time fixed for a vote upon it, which ought to give ample opportunity for its discussion by any Senator who desires to discuss it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. My proposition is to restore the status quo and therefore give the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the right that he intended to exercise. I have been the innocent cause of depriving him of that right, and I do not believe the Senate is going to insist upon a condition of that sort.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is not well founded.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I may not have just the trend of that which went on previous to my coming into the Chamber. I am willing to vote on the question at an opportune time, but I object to its consideration at this particular time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very much in favor of the bill in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] is interested, and I expect to support it; but I do think that it would be absolutely unfair to insist on this unanimous-consent agreement standing. I want to say now that if it were a bill in which I was interested, and the unanimous-consent agreement was obtained in this way, I would not support it, because the unanimous-consent agreement is a sacred agreement here in the Senate, and it should not be enforced unless every Senator has an opportunity to be heard when it is proposed. It is a very drastic practice that we have. I am speaking as one who is interested in the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have not made up my mind what action I shall take on the bill, but I promised a number of Senators, and I told them that if I were in the Chamber and they were not present, I would object to any unanimous-consent agreement. Morning business was in progress, and I did not expect such consent would then be asked. As I have heretofore stated, I was talking to the Senator from Arkansas at the time. I think it would be unfortunate if the Senator from Tennessee should insist upon the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator. I only want an opportunity to say that I am very much in favor of the bill; I want to assist in passing it; I want to vote for it; but I can not consent to giving my approval to the situation here, if it is insisted upon, in enforcing the unanimous-consent agreement, because with a Senator in the Chamber with his intention and his purpose fixed to object to unanimous consent, he being misled through an inadvertence and by having his attention withdrawn in the manner narrated here—to take advantage of such a situation and insist on the enforcement of the unanimous-consent agreement, to my mind, would not be fair, and it is action which will injure the enforcement by the honor of the Senate of unanimous-consent agreements in the manner which has always prevailed. I believe it will injure the custom, the practice, and the rule, if it shall be insisted upon under such circumstances.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the request for unanimous consent has been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request for unanimous consent has been agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I do not understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] has power to change the consent agreement or withdraw it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee who made the request has a right to ask that the vote by which it was agreed to may be reconsidered, and that is what I ask the Senator now to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would say to the Senator from Utah that the present occupant of the chair does not profess to be an authority on parliamentary law, but he has heard it stated time and time again in the Senate that a unanimous-consent agreement once entered into could not, even by unanimous consent, be modified or in any maner altered or changed, and the Chair certainly would want some authority to entertain such a request.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, such agreements have been modified by unanimous consent time and time again since I have been in the Senate. I do not think but what the Senate can do anything that it desires by unanimous consent. They can change by unanimous consent a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, without discussing the merits of this particular agreement, I take issue with the Senator from Utah upon that proposition. If that were true, there would be no such thing as a unanimous-consent agreement in the Senate Chamber. If a unanimous-consent agreement could be entered into here and the next day set aside when other Senators who had relied upon it were not here, there would be no such thing as a unanimous-consent agreement in this Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me a question there, Is it really a unanimous-consent agreement? A Member being present intending to object did not give his consent because his attention was diverted by another Senator, and under a proceeding that was then in order, the introduction of bills. He did not hear the statement read; he was opposed to the unanimous-consent agreement, and through his attention being so diverted he did not give his consent, but he was deprived of the opportunity of withholding his consent, although present and intending to do it. Those facts are stated here by Senators and are not in dispute. Did the Senate, then, unanimously consent to this order?

Mr. SMOOT. If I had been out of the Chamber, it would have been an entirely different proposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the Senator from Utah was here.

Mr. SMOOT. I was here and the Senate was acting under the order of morning business.

Mr. BORAH. That makes it all the more difficult to get rid of this situation. If the Senator had been out of the Chamber, it might have been different; but the Senator was in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States wants to establish this rule, and if the Senate will not by unanimous consent agree to the abrogation of this unanimous-consent agreement, I think there is a very dangerous precedent being established.

Mr. BRISTOW and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is recognized. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will be recognized when the Senator from Kansas concludes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I regard this as a very serious matter. If a unanimous-consent agreement of this kind were secured on a bill in which I was interested, I would not respect the unanimous-consent agreement; I would violate it without any hesitation, as I would have a right to do under the rules of the Senate and under my obligations as a Senator to my constituents. If it is proposed now to break down the rule of unanimous consent, we can do it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry for information, because I was engaged as a member of the Commerce Committee in listening to the hearing now being held by that committee. In company with several other Senators, all of us anxious to come to the Senate, we were at that work, and remained because we relied upon the fact that the order of business was the presentation of petitions and memorials, reports of committees, and the introduction of bills. A messenger was sent down from the committee to ascertain what head the Senate was under and had reported only a moment before I left the committee room. I want to inquire, therefore, what order of business the Senate was actually under at the time this unanimous consent was asked?

Mr. SMOOT. The introduction of bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate was acting under the order of introduction of bills.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, was unanimous consent asked to vary the order of business or was this request for unanimous consent thrust into the order of business and out of order itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent order was asked for separately and independently, by itself.

Mr. REED. That is to say, we were under the order of the introduction of bills when unanimous consent was asked without first getting the consent of the Senate in any way to set aside the order then before the Senate. If that is true, exactly the same situation is presented that was presented yesterday. On yesterday the Senator from Tennessee, under this same order of business, arose. He did not ask to have the order of business temporarily laid aside, but he asked for unanimous consent to have his bill taken up at some future date. I raised the point of order that the request was out of order. The then Presiding Officer, I think misapprehending the situation, ruled that the Senate could do anything by unanimous consent. That is practically true, but the unanimous consent which should have been asked was to vary the order of business, and after that had been granted then the request for the unanimous-consent agreement should have been presented.

Mr. President, without using any harsh terms, it is manifestly in the nature of a snap judgment upon the members of the Senate who were absent——

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. When I conclude the sentence—who were absent from the Senate and relying upon the order of business being carried out if that order of business has thrust into it something which is entirely foreign to it and is not properly introducable at that particular time.

I do not mean to say that the Senator from Tennessee meant to take an unfair advantage, but if this practice were to be indulged in, then manifestly all that any Senator can do who has service upon a committee to perform is to be here in his seat every moment, trusting nothing to the rules, nothing to the order of business, and understanding that an order may at any time be made binding upon him and the Senate, which can not be set aside by the Senate itself by unanimous consent, even with the acquiescence of the Senator who obtained the order. That is the situation in which we would be placed if the construction of the Senator from Idaho is correct.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I have been waiting patiently for an opportunity to disclaim any intention of taking an undue advantage of Senators. I am glad to hear the Senator from Missouri retract the statement that I did take such an advantage. I should like to see other Senators also retract. But while I was waiting for that opportunity a point of order was raised. I waited until that was decided.

I want to say that I have not been here very long, not so long as some of the Senators who are now objecting, and I may not have learned my lesson properly; but I have seen unanimous-consent agreements made here when there were not half as many Members in the Senate as there are now; I have seen unanimous-consent agreements made without any technical call for a change of the order of business; I have seen unanimous-consent agreements made here this morning and under the same circumstances, and no objection was made. So, as I have said, I may be a little premature in this matter and a little inexperienced, but I have learned what I am doing and saying from some of the older Senators who are here.

I want to say now that I positively disclaim any intention to take any advantage of anybody, and if the point of order that the unanimous-consent agreement can not be withdrawn is not sustained, I would be willing to yield to the Senators who have expressed a different view; but I should like to have the point of order made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] passed upon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I did not retract anything I said, because I intended to say nothing to reflect upon the Senator from Tennessee. What I said was that if this practice was indulged in it might lay the foundation for what we might term snap judgment, but I said that I did not want to employ that harsh a term. I will embrace this opportunity to express for the Senator from Tennessee the highest regard and to say that I do not think he has been actuated by any improper motive.

Now, with reference to the point of order, I suggest this to the Presiding Officer before he rules: It is quite one thing for the Senate, fully advised of what it is doing, to grant unanimous consent and to then pass on to some other order of business, so that Senators who were here at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was made may, some of them, have passed from the Chamber, and then, when there is a different membership present, to ask to vary the order of business. That would be one thing; but it is the rule——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I will when I conclude my sentence—but it is the rule everywhere that an act can be set aside when the request is made simultaneously with the doing of the act. A judgment of court is made, and when solemnly entered the court sometimes can not set aside that judgment, but when the judge has merely announced a judgment and instantly his attention is called to a mistake he can always at the time disregard the order. So I make the point that under these circumstances, when the request comes immediately after the ruling of the Chair, it would be a very harsh and a very dangerous rule to say that something had been done which can never be altered. If time had elapsed, if the membership had changed, a different question would be presented.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I did not formally raise a point of order. I simply suggested the proposition that having made a unanimous-consent agreement I did not see how we could change it. In view of the attitude of mind of the Senator interested in this matter, I do not want to make the point of order. If he can do so, I certainly should not interpose any objection to his undertaking to do so. I have no doubt myself—and I say it in the presence of the parliamentarians of the Senate—that we are now establishing a precedent never established before; but I shall not formally raise the point of order. It would perhaps be embarrassing to the Senator who asked for the agreement for me to do so. I think the peculiar circumstances ought to exempt this proceeding from becoming a precedent.

Mr. OLIVER. I think there is a way of avoiding this difficulty without doing violence to any of our rules or any of our customs. The request for unanimous consent was made by the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Utah, who would ordinarily have objected to it, had his attention temporarily called to other matters——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there is so much noise——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that there may be order. I am unable to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. I will finish what I have to say in one moment.

Mr. KENYON. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that we can not hear.

Mr. OLIVER. It is very difficult for me to speak anyway, as I am suffering from a severe cold.

I have seen times without number when a proposition was put before the Senate and the Chair decided that it was carried, that the vote was taken again. If the Chair decided that the "ayes" had it or the "noes" had it, a second division was called for. I think this is precisely a parallel case. The Chair had no more than announced that there was no objection and that the unanimous-consent agreement was ordered, than the Senator from Utah rose and called the attention of the Chair to the fact that he had not known that the discussion was going on.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I think it is entirely within the power of the Senate to consider the question as not settled and, as a matter of courtesy if nothing else, to allow it to be put a second time to the Senate.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I heard this motion put. I knew it was going on, and I had no intention of objecting to it. I am rather inclined to think that when this bill comes before the Senate for action I will vote in its favor. But I think every Senator opposed to it ought to have a right to be heard, and especially to interpose objection to a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Chair will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that after agreement to the unanimous consent had been announced by the Chair other business was transacted.

Mr. SMOOT. But I was on the floor asking for recognition.

Mr. OLIVER. The Clerk has just informed me——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was unavoidably kept out of the Chamber during the morning hour or during the time intervening between 12 o'clock——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to hear what the Senator from New Hampshire is saying.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested, Mr. President, that I was unavoidably kept from the Chamber when this transaction occurred. Having been out of the Chamber, if I had been opposed to this unanimous-consent agreement, to which I am not opposed, I would not have felt that I had any right after the unanimous-consent agreement was made to raise an objection, even though I had entered the Chamber at the very moment the Chair announced the result.

The Senator from Tennessee, I take it, asked for a unanimous-consent agreement in the usual way. It is done over and over and over again during the morning hour. We do not formally lay aside the order of petitions or reports of committees or bills and joint resolutions to allow Senators to make requests of this kind, and I submit to the Chair, although I apprehend it is unnecessary, that this consent having been given it can not by any possibility under our rules be vacated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to ask him——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to submit to the Senator—I do not know whether he was here when I before called attention to it—whether or not it is a unanimous consent of the Senate; whether or not the Senate has given unanimous consent if a Senator is present in the Chamber at the time, opposed to the unanimous-consent agreement, fully intending to make objection to it, and because he is chairman of an important committee another Senator comes to him on official business of this body and his attention is momentarily diverted while the tentative proposal is being read, and he, being present, not having heard it, and being opposed to it, immediately upon learning of it makes his protest—I wish to know whether it has, in that condition, assumed the form of a unanimous-consent agreement which absolutely bars this body from correcting what it has done through inadvertence when a Member was present at the time who did not consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I apprehend there are several Senators here now who would have made objection had they been in the Chamber, but as no one in the Chamber made objection, the fact that a Senator's attention was diverted is no reason why the agreement should not stand. If we establish any other rule, we will vacate every unanimous-consent agreement that is made in this body.

I again submit that the fact that a Senator's attention was diverted is not sufficient reason for asking that a unanimous-consent agreement should be annulled. The Senator from Tennessee, as I recall it, has on several former occasions asked for this consent agreement under precisely similar circumstances that he asked this morning, and objection was made. He made another request, which was granted, and it is now asked that it shall be again submitted because some Senator did not hear it.

Now, Mr. President, all I desire to say is this: That if we are not going to observe unanimous-consent agreements when they are properly submitted and agreed to, the Chair declaring that there is no objection to the request, then we might just as well do away entirely with efforts to get unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think that if a unanimous-consent request was made, and the Chair stated that no objection was heard, and immediately a Senator was to rise and say that his attention had been for the moment diverted and asked that the question be again put, there would be any objection, parliamentary or otherwise, to its being again put?

Mr. GALLINGER. In answer to that I will say that under those circumstances, if I was in the chair, I would not again put the request simply because some Senator demanded it; and I am sure that if I undertook to do it a single objection would lie against it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would not the Senator have recognized the request——

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Or a statement made by a Senator that his attention was diverted?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that he intended to object?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And a request that the question be put again?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not, any more than if a Senator had come in and stated that he had been called into the lobby, and that if he had been present he would have objected?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is the case——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is the case, I should say it would be a very unsatisfactory condition. If a Senator was in his seat and intended to object to a request for unanimous consent, and had his attention momentarily distracted, and immediately made that statement to the Senate, it seems to me the Chair should, without the slightest hesitation, again put the question, just as we have seen the question put upon votes here time and time again.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was called from the Chamber at the time on a matter of business before the Senate and did not hear what was the unanimous-consent agreement asked for. I knew nothing about it, except that I assume it fixes a date to vote on the so-called Kenyon bill.

I have asked the Reporter if he would be kind enough to read the proceedings from the time the Senator from Tennessee made his request until the request was granted, if the Chair will allow it to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I offer the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, 1913, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered and upon the bill itself not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I submit a proposed amendment to the Sherman Antitrust Act and ask that it be printed with the memorandum in relation thereto as a part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Was there a unanimous-consent agreement just entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was; just agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there are a number of Senators out of the Chamber, etc.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. SANDERS. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to say a word?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I think the atmosphere is somewhat cleared now, and with an apology to the Senate for presenting this matter, I will pursue a different procedure. I think——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. SANDERS. Just a word, if you please. This is a very grave question——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yielded for a question, and if the Senator has a question he may propound it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor, and if he does not further yield——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yielded for a question, thinking the Senator desired to ask a question; but if he desires to make a speech he will have an opportunity in about three minutes.

Mr. SANDERS. I beg pardon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The question that is being discussed here now is broader than the question immediately involved. What would be the capacity of the Senate to deal with a unanimous-consent agreement is broader than the question with which we are now confronted.

The contention is made, and rightfully made, that no unanimous consent was given willingly. The Senator from Utah said it was his fixed purpose to enter his objection to the consideration of that application, and that he was only prevented from doing so by being called on to discharge the duties pertaining to his place by one who had a right to apply for such service; and that although present, his mind never gave consent to what was sought to be done.

For myself I would be very glad to see such an order entered. I am in favor of the bill and will vote at any time to take it up. I think the time allowed is very reasonable. It is a bill I favor. But I do not favor the Senate giving unanimous consent, directly or indirectly, under such circumstances. The dominant law of this Chamber is courtesy, and every Senator is treated with at least fairness, and when a Senator states upon his word that he intended to pursue a certain course and has been deprived of the opportunity to do so, it has been the pleasure of the Senate to promptly respond and to place him where he would have been placed had he not been casually deprived of his right in that behalf.

While I am ardently in favor of the passage of the bill, which would be advanced by acquiescence in the request of the Senator from Tennessee, I would not favor methods of that kind to further its progress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas suspend for a moment to enable the Senate to receive a message from the House of Representatives?

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, was received.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall not detain the Senate any further. I think I have stated the reasons why I think this is an exceptional case and why exceptional treatment should be applied.

Mr. SANDERS. Having explained my intention and position in this matter, I now wish——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will suspend for a moment to enable the Senate to receive a message from the President of the United States.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, was received.

Mr. SANDERS. I wish to ask that this matter be again submitted to the Senate, giving to anyone who wishes to object an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In what form does the Senator put his request?

Mr. SANDERS. The request I made, which I think is a very great mistake, I want to say, is that the question be submitted to the Senate again, giving opportunity for Senators to object if they wish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SANDERS. I am free to say I have been criticized so much now as to the procedure this morning that I do not wish to say just what form it should take.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, not as a matter of unanimous consent, but as a matter of right, over and over again the Chair rules here that a bill has passed. We do business rapidly in that way. The Chair afterwards hears objection from a Senator and stops and says that the bill is still before the Senate. Just so in this case.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield quite yet to the Senator from California. Just so in this case. This unanimous-consent request was laid before the Senate, and the Senator from Utah rose as the Chair made his announcement to ask if it was before the Senate, and that was done before the Senate had passed to any other business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just one moment. The Chair must remind the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Utah rose to ask of the Chair if the Senate had considered——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely; so that he might learn whether that had been before the Senate, and then record his dissent.

Mr. GALLINGER. And after other business had been transacted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The President of the Senate, over and over again, rules rapidly on questions, and allows Senators immediately afterwards to reopen the question. It is a mode of rapid procedure that is conducted in the Senate in the nature of unanimous consent, which yields immediately afterwards to the objection of any Senator.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me, with our lax mode of allowing requests for unanimous consent, which perhaps should be reached by a rule fixing the exact hour when they should be made, in order that we might all be present to watch against them, we should at least have the privilege, when we catch a request of that kind before the Senate has passed to something else, to ask to record objections. Otherwise a Senator could not speak to another Senator for a moment, otherwise he could not write a letter, he could not examine another measure.

In this instance the Senator from Utah, before the Senate had changed to any other subject, before anything else had been done, rose and inquired to learn the matter that had been brought before the Senate, that he might still object. I have never seen in the Senate during the past nine months a measure passed or action taken on a decision by the Chair upon a matter pending before the Senate where a Senator at once rose and desired still to object that the Chair did not at once say the matter is still open and allow the Senator to be heard. So it seems to me the proper course of action for us to take is to declare the matter still before the Senate. If that action is taken, then, it seems to me, the course we should pursue would be to submit to the Senate the right to fix a practice—there is no rule controlling it—and that practice should be that a unanimous consent can be set aside by another unanimous consent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am not going to say what shall be done with this unanimous-consent agreement, but I want to testify to the transaction that occurred when the Senator from Tennessee offered the order. The Senator from Tennessee rose and asked for recognition. He was recognized by the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the order of the Senate legislative business must now be laid aside.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, the respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last day's proceedings.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, January 9, 1913, sitting as a court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, before we proceed with the argument to-day I should like to know to what time I may speak in order that the time between now and 6 o'clock may be divided so as to give the managers their full half of the time spent in argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has kept the time occupied by each side and will read the same.

The SECRETARY. Up to the hour of 1 o'clock to-day the House managers have occupied 4 hours and 58 minutes, the respondent's counsel 4 hours and 23 minutes.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I beg to say that I was very particular the other day in stating in the opening and before agreeing to this arrangement, in response to an inquiry addressed to the managers by the Chair, that seven hours and a half for the discussion of this question accorded to the managers would be acceptable to the managers. As I understand it, Mr. President, that interpretation of the allotment of time was agreed to by the Chair, and it was the understanding; and therefore, Mr. President, I am constrained to ask the Senate to accord to me not a division of the remainder of the time, but the time which I have reserved, to wit, 2 hours and 32 minutes. The Chair will readily perceive——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will permit the Chair to state that he will make the necessary order in the matter.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. It was only in reply to the suggestion of the respondent's counsel, who sought to cut me off from that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not criticizing the manager, but he simply desires to accommodate his wishes.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate continue in session as a Court of Impeachment this day long enough after 6 o'clock to give both sides the allotted time, seven hours and a half.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Utah that the Senate to-day shall continue in session long enough after 6 o'clock to give to the managers and also counsel for the respondent the seven hours and a half originally contemplated. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the request? To remain in session to-night?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request was that after 6 o'clock, which is the ordinary hour for adjournment, the Senate shall stay in session long enough to give each side the time originally contemplated, the difficulty having arisen out of the consumption of a part of the time by other matters. It will probably not be over half an hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long will we be kept in session after 6 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. About half an hour, under the order adopted on motion of the Senator from Utah. Mr. Worthington has the floor.

CONTINUATION OF ARGUMENT OF MR. WORTHINGTON OF COUNSEL FOR RESPONDENT.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President and Senators, I am not a prophet, but I venture to guess that it will not be necessary, as far as the time I shall occupy is concerned, to extend the time of the session beyond the usual hour of 6 o'clock, giving to the manager who is to close the argument his full remainder of the seven hours and a half for his side.

I want for a moment to recur briefly to the questions of law which I discussed yesterday.

A great many text writers have been cited by the managers, and some of them say that certain offenses which should constitute impeachable offenses are not crimes and therefore would not be indictable. But as to most of the offenses of that kind to which the text writers and managers refer I think it will clearly appear from the authorities to which I referred the Senate yesterday that they are criminal by the common law as misconduct in office. As to several of the others they distinctly state that where an officer is guilty of maladministration—not referring to judges alone, but all civil officers—whether indictable or not, he should be impeached; whereas we all know that in the Constitutional Convention, as was read yesterday—it was doubtless unnecessary to read it to anybody in the Senate—the word "maladministration," which was first offered, was struck out because it was too general and would practically allow all civil officers to be removed at any time at the pleasure of the Senate, and the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" were substituted.

But, taking the textbooks, I do not see that any comfort can be gathered by the managers from considering all that they say on the subject. I have here an extract from Story on the Constitution, on whom the managers seem most to rely in this connection to support their claim that it is not necessary that an officer who is impeached by the House should be charged with an offense which is indictable. I shall read a paragraph from Story on this subject, which the managers did not read, from section 797 of his work on the Constitution. In what was read by the managers, Story states his conception of the old English cases on impeachment. Then he goes on to say—and to this I ask the particular attention of Senators—

> Resort, then, must be had either to parliamentary practice and the common law, in order to ascertain what are high crimes and misdemeanors, or the whole subject must be left to the arbitrary discretion of the Senate for the time being. (Story on the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 581.)

That the matter must be left to the arbitrary discretion of the Senate is what the managers now claim, so far as any of them have addressed themselves to this question up to this time.

> The latter is so incompatible with the genius of our institutions that no lawyer or statesman would be inclined to countenance so absolute a despotism of opinion and practice, which might make that a crime at one time, or in one person, which would be deemed innocent at another time, or in another person. The only safe guide in such cases must be the common law, which is the guardian at once of private rights and public liberties. (Story on the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 581.)

In the same connection he characterized as harsh and severe the English authority or rules which he referred to in the passage which has been read and is here relied upon by the managers.

In another place, section 798, I read one clause on page 582:

> It is remarkable that the First Congress, assembled in October, 1774, in their famous declaration of the rights of the Colonies, asserted—> that the respective Colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and that they are entitled to the benefit of such of the English statutes as existed at the time of their colonization, and which they have by experience, respectively, found to be applicable to their several local and other circumstances.

Quoting from the declaration of 1774—

That is the end of the quotation. Story goes on:

> It would be singular enough if, in framing a national government, that common law so justly dear to the Colonies as their guide and protection should cease to have any existence as applicable to the powers, rights, and privileges of people or the obligations and duties and powers of the departments of the National Government. If the common law has no existence as to the Union as a rule or guide, the whole proceedings are completely at the arbitrary pleasure of the Government and its functionaries in all its departments. (Story on the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 583.)

Story was there dealing with the proposition to which I referred yesterday, that since the Supreme Court had decided that there are no common-law offenses in the Federal courts generally, therefore there is no common law upon which the Senate can act in cases of impeachment; and dealing with that very subject he reaches the same conclusion which we had reached in our argument on that point.

As to the State cases I shall not undertake to deal with them especially, but I want also to read a paragraph or two from the language of that great jurist Lemuel Shaw when he was chairman of the managers in the Prescott case in Massachusetts, opposed to Daniel Webster, who represented the respondent. He had been referring to the removal by address, which, as we all know, was a proceeding by which any civil officer could be removed in England, and can to-day be removed in most of the States, without charging him with any crime or offense and putting him only in that plight which any civil officer is in to-day if the President happens to turn him out. I am reading from page 118 of the Prescott Trial. He says:

The two modes of proceeding are altogether distinct, and in my humble apprehension were designed to effect totally distinct objects. No, sir; had the house of representatives expected to attain their object—

That is, the House of Representatives of Massachusetts—

by any means short of the allegation, proof, and conviction of criminal misconduct an address and not an impeachment would have been the course of proceeding adopted by them. (Prescott's Trial, 1821, p. 182.)

He is speaking for the managers, of whom he was the chairman. He says that if the managers had been sent to the Senate and had "expected to attain their object by any means short of the allegation, proof, and conviction of criminal misconduct, an address and not an impeachment would have been the course of proceeding adopted by them."

We readily therefore agree that here is no question of expediency, of fitness or unfitness, but one of judicial inquiry of guilt or innocence. We make no appeal to the will or discretion, but address ourselves solely to the understanding, the judgment, and the consciences of the judges of this honorable court. We also cheerfully accede to the proposition that this is a court of justice of criminal jurisdiction, possessing all the attributes and incidents of such a court.

Further along on the same page:

The general principle of law, upon which we rely in support of this prosecution, is that any willful violation of law, or any willful and corrupt act of omission or commission, in execution, or under color of that office, the duties of which the respondent has sworn to perform and discharge faithfully and impartially according to the best of his abilities and understanding, agreeable to the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth, is such an act of misconduct and maladministration in office as will render him liable to punishment by impeachment. Such oath of office, being prescribed by the supreme law, in addition to the religious obligation upon the conscience of the officer, imposes a legal obligation as binding and explicit as if the constitution had provided in other words that every officer acting under it, should so perform and discharge the duties of his office under pain of impeachment. But what those duties are must be a subject of inquiry in each particular case, and must be ascertained by reference to express laws relating to such office or to the principles of the common law, and those general and obvious rules resulting from the nature, purposes, and powers of the office in question.

That was the statement made by Judge Shaw, on behalf of the managers in that case, as to what they claimed under a constitution which used the word "maladministration" as one of the things for which an officer could be removed. If you apply that doctrine to this case, then by what these managers say over and over again and have admitted during the arguments in this case this respondent must be acquitted, because they do not charge anything of the kind.

Now, Mr. Manager HOWLAND referred to the Barnard case in New York bearing upon this doctrine, and I understood him to say there was a certain part of the charge which it was argued did not amount to an indictable offense, and that notwithstanding that the respondent was convicted. Either I misunderstood him or he has misunderstood the case. What happened was this: There was a certain article of impeachment which made a general charge and then gave a long list of specifications under that charge, some 20 in number, as I remember. As to one of those specifications, it was argued at great length that the respondent should not be convicted upon that because that specification did not set forth an indictable offense. But no vote was ever taken upon that specification, and that question was not passed upon at all by the court. When the end came a vote was taken upon the general charge in that article with all its specifications, and Judge Barnard was convicted of the general charge, so that it made no difference whether the particular specification referred to did or did not charge an impeachable offense.

Some of the illustrations used in the briefs which I had the pleasure of reading last night, which have been submitted by Mr. Manager NORRIS and Mr. Manager DAVIS, contain the suggestion that a judge may decide cases contrary to his honest conviction, and that that would not be an indictable offense.

I know not where the managers find that law; they do not find it in the common law of England or of any place in this country, because if a judge does intentionally disregard his duty and decides a case or makes any order in a way he believes to be wrong, he is guilty of an indictable offense and could from time immemorial be punished for it. So they go on to say he may decide from partiality or, as one of the learned managers says, unblushingly use partiality. Of course that is nothing but bribery. Or he may be drunk on the bench; that is disorderly conduct, as in the Pickering case. Or he may be guilty of usurpation of power; I confess that that is a thing which appeals to me and appeals to a great many people in this country; there have been some recent events which have brought it to the attention of everybody. If a judge does intentionally send a man to jail, usurps that power, not believing that he has the right to do it, then, of course, he has committed an indictable offense as well as an impeachable offense. That was the whole question in the Peck trial, where a lawyer who appeared before Judge Peck was sent to jail and was suspended from practice for 18 months for having criticized a decision of the judge in his case. The whole question in the case was whether the judge honestly believed he had the right to do that. His counsel never pretended that Judge Peck was not guilty of an indictable and impeachable offense if he had sent Lawless to jail believing that he did not have the right to do so.

Just a word about the law relating to articles 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11. The Barnard case is one in which the court decided that since the respondent in that case was holding the second term of the same office, he might be impeached for what he did in the first term; but in the report of that case, on pages 158 to 160, is a reference to another case in the same court—the case of Fuller—from which I quote:

Proceedings which were taken in the assembly upon an inquiry made into the judicial conduct of one Phil. C. Fuller, the house directed the judiciary committee to inquire and report:

First. Whether a person could be impeached who at the time of his impeachment was not the holder of an office under the laws of this State.

Second. Whether a person could be impeached and deprived of his office for malconduct or offenses done or committed under a prior term of the same or any other office.

Presenting what I suppose is intended to be a distinction between many cases and the present on the part of my learned adversary, founded upon the fact that Justice Barnard was an incumbent of this office from the term preceding the 1st of January, 1869, I do not well perceive how that circumstance could give foundation for any discrimination, because the principle upon which the doctrine is founded—that you can not impeach for acts committed previous to the tenure of the office—is that the new election, signifying the voice and the judgment of the people, purges and purifies the offender from the contamination of any previous conduct or offense. That it is an expression of the will of the people, not only a judgment upon his qualifications but an expression of that will; that as he is and whatever he may be he is by that sovereign voice selected as a delegate to represent their power in the office to which he may be selected.

Mr. Weeks, from the judiciary committee, reported that:

"The only clause in the constitution relating to judgment upon impeachments provides that judgments in such cases shall not extend further than the removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under this State, but the party impeached shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law.

"From this and from the theory upon which our Government is based the committee have come to the conclusion:

"First. That no person can be impeached who was not at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and at the time of the impeachment holding some office under the laws of this State.

"That the person impeached must have been in office at the time of the commission of the alleged offense is clear from the theory of our Government, viz, that all power is with the people, who, if they saw fit, might elect a man to office guilty of every moral turpitude, and no court has the power to thwart this their will and say he shall not hold the office to which they have elected him. A contrary doctrine would subvert the spirit of our institutions.

"It is equally clear from the tenor of the constitution that the person must be in office at the time of the impeachment. This instrument provides but two modes of punishment, viz, removal from office, or removal or disqualification to hold office. In either mode of punishment the person must be in office, for removal is contemplated in both cases, which can not be effected unless the person is in office.

"The courts are the only tribunals that have jurisdiction over a delinquent after his term of office has expired to punish him for offenses committed in the discharge of the duties of his office."

The committee have further come to the conclusion—

"Secondly. That no person can be impeached and deprived of his present term of office for offenses alleged to have been committed during a prior term of the same or any other office.

"Neither by the constitution nor by our laws is there any period limited in which an impeachment may be found. It is but fair, therefore, to infer that the intention was to confine the time to the term of office during which the offenses were alleged to have been committed; indeed any other conclusion would lead to results which could not be sustained, for who can say but that the people knew of this malconduct, these offenses, and elected the individual notwithstanding? True, an extreme case might be put of fraud committed on the last day of the term of an office, to which office the individual might be immediately reelected, yet who could say this was not known to the people? How is the matter to be settled? The mere statement of the question shows the dilemma in which we would be placed at every election if the tenure or stability of an office depended upon a legal inquiry as to whether the people knew the characters of the individuals they had elected to office and had exercised a proper discretion.

"However much it may be desired to have men of high integrity and honesty to fill our public offices of trust and honor, yet by our constitution and the fundamental principles of our Government no particular scale of integrity, honesty, or morality is fixed. No inquisition as to what character had been can be held; it is enough that the people have willed the person should hold the office, and the courts, which are but the mere creatures of the public, will have no power to interfere.

"The constitution provides, as we have seen, that a person can not be impeached after he is out of office. Then, if the same person should be reelected to the same office a year afterwards, would this right of impeachment be revived? In fine, by his reelection would he incur any other liabilities or acquire any other rights than those incident to his present term of office? We think a moment's reflection would convince each person that it could not.

"Again, could an officer be deprived of his present office by impeachment for malconduct in another and different office, or even the same office, 20 years before his present term commenced? If not, could he after one year or one moment had elapsed? Where is the difference in the principle? The time is nothing. The question is, Is he out of office? It matters not if he is the next moment inducted in.

"The committee think it clear, in every light they have been able to view this matter, that the constitution intended to confine impeachments to persons in office and for offenses committed during the term of the office for which the person is sought to be removed. In pursuance of this conclusion the committee recommend to the house the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee of investigation into the official conduct of State officers and of persons lately, but not now, holding office, be instructed—

"1. That a person whose term of office has expired is not liable to impeachment for any misconduct under section 1, article 6, of the constitution.

"2. That a person holding an elective office is not liable to be impeached, under section 1, article 6, of the constitution, for any misconduct before the commencement of his term, although such misconduct occurred while he held the same or another office under a previous election."

Counsel also referred to the Belknap case. That was a case in which a majority of the Senate decided that Belknap could be impeached, notwithstanding that he was not an officer when he was impeached. But in that case it appeared, as I stated yesterday and as everybody who looks at the record will see, that Belknap was over in the room of the Judiciary Committee of the House at 10 o'clock in the morning of a certain day, when that committee was closing the taking of testimony in his case, and he there learned that a resolution was that day to be reported to the House when it should meet recommending his impeachment. He thereupon went directly to the White House—these are admitted facts—saw President Grant, tendered his resignation, and had it accepted. So that he was out of office before the House met and before there was an opportunity on the part of the Judiciary Committee to report the resolution favoring his impeachment. Afterwards, but on the same day, it was passed by the House. The managers, when they came here, put in the plea that even if an officer ordinarily could not be punished for a crime committed in office after his term of office had expired, he could be punished after he resigned for the purpose of escaping punishment. How many of the Senators who voted that he might be impeached did so on that ground, and how many on the ground that an officer may be impeached at any length of time after he is out of office, I do not know and nobody can tell to this day.

There was another case which has not yet been referred to, a very interesting case in this connection. When Mr. Schuyler Colfax was the Speaker of the House, he, with a number of other Members of the House, became involved in what was called the Credit Mobilier scandal.

It appeared in the testimony that was taken by the investigating committee of the House in that case that he received from Oakes Ames a number of shares of the stock of a company which was largely interested in getting legislation through Congress for the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad. His guilt appeared to be manifest by the ex parte testimony which was taken, and the House took steps looking to his impeachment. He was, however, then Vice President of the United States; he was no longer Speaker of the House; but had become Vice President and presided here. The matter was considered by the Judiciary Committee, but no action was taken upon it, because it appeared that the term of the House was about to expire and his office as Vice President was about to come to an end, and so they dropped it. There was no reason for dropping it if the contention of the managers is correct about that matter.

There is another thing that I do not like to refer to here, but I feel obliged to do so, notwithstanding it calls to mind the misdeeds of one who was once a Member of this body and has now gone to his last rest. The gentleman of whom I speak was once cashier of a bank in this city. While he was cashier he embezzled a sum of between twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars. His friends or family made up the amount and he was never prosecuted; just why I do not know, and it does not matter, but he went out to a far Western State, and in due course of time he had so rehabilitated himself and so conducted himself that he came to Washington as a Member of this body—as a Senator from the State of North Dakota. In the Senate, while he was here, the question was raised whether he should not be expelled because he had committed this offense, notwithstanding that it was committed before he was a Senator. The matter was discussed at great length by Senators on either side. I have not the reference here to the place in the RECORD in which that debate is recorded. The matter was never even brought to a vote, the argument being made, and apparently being unanswerable, that for anything that he had done before his State sent him to this body he could not here be held accountable.

It certainly would be a remarkable thing if this doctrine should be established, because in that case every man who has been in public life at any time should take notice that he remains liable to impeachment so long as he lives. The President of the United States, for instance, held four or five different offices under this Government before he became President, and, according to this doctrine, he could now be impeached for anything he did while he was Solicitor General, or governor of the Philippines, or Secretary of War, and, upon conviction, he would be forever debarred from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, even that which he now holds. And that might have been done in the case of his predecessor, who was formerly Assistant Secretary of the Navy, if anybody had chosen to take that step while he was President. So that any man who has held one or more public offices is always at the mercy of somebody who may stir up some offense which he is alleged to have committed at some other period and in some other office and bring him to the bar of the Senate to defend himself years after his witnesses are dead, his papers are lost, and his memory fails to record the transaction.

I pass from that, and I proceed again to discuss the merits of this case, the articles of impeachment, which have been left to me particularly to consider. I was referring to article 6 yesterday when the adjournment came, and I want to add a few words about that article.

I know how difficult it is for Senators to carry these different articles and transactions and the evidence which relates to them in their minds. That was a case in which it was charged in four or five lines of the article, without any specification whatever, that Judge Archbald had sought to use his influence as a judge to induce the Lehigh Valley Railroad or the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which was a part of that railroad company, to purchase the interest of certain persons, called the Everharts, in the mine which that company was working.

It appears that Mr. Williams took Mr. Dainty, who was the person concerned in that transaction, to Judge Archbald's office and told him that Judge Archbald wanted to see him. At that time, as the evidence discloses and as it will appear when I come to consider article 1, Judge Archbald and Williams had a letter from Capt. May stating that he would recommend a sale of the interest of his company in the Katydid dump. They were stopped in that transaction because of the outstanding claim of the Everhart heirs, from whom they had no writing or authority. Those heirs were scattered in various parts of the United States and held small fractional interests in the Katydid dump. Dainty says that when he arrived at the judge's office the judge told him that he wanted to see him about getting the interest of the Everhart heirs in the Katydid dump. It appears from Dainty's testimony and from the testimony of other witnesses that Dainty was in close communication with the Everhart heirs and was the one person in that region who would be likely to get them to dispose of their interest in the Katydid dump. After the judge had told him that that was what he wanted, Dainty said, "Judge, I should like to see Mr. Warriner; they want to get the Everhart interest in their property, too, and I should like to have them buy the Everhart interest and let me attend to it." Of course, he was after his commission for bringing about a sale of the interests of the Everhart heirs. The judge said, "Why do you not go and see Mr. Warriner?" Dainty replied, "I do not know Mr. Warriner," and he asked the judge to see Warriner and make that representation for him. The judge, with that kindness with which he acted for all the people who came to him to ask him to help them, in consideration, evidently, of the fact that he was asking Dainty to get him the Everhart interest in the Katydid dump, offered to see Mr. Warriner and ask him to let Mr. Dainty get him the Everhart interest in the property of Warriner's company. He went there and had one conversation, at least, with him, and possibly two, although the evidence is not clear on that point, and was told that the coal company would buy the Everhart interest whenever they could, paying whatever they had paid for the other proportionate interests of the same kind. There the transaction ended, and there was nothing more of it.

Now, it should be borne in mind that at that time, as Mr. Warriner testifies, it was not proposed or suggested that they would pay any more than they had paid for the other interests. They would only pay in the same proportion. They were paying the outstanding Everhart interests their royalties, and if they paid them the money which was due them, some $30,000, they would stop paying the royalties. So it was simply a question of royalties against interest, and the two things amounted to the same thing; so it was not a matter which concerned Mr. Warriner's company to any great extent.

The Morris & Essex tract, which was referred to in connection with the testimony of Mr. Dainty, is a tract of land which is owned by the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., but which was not on or near its lines, so that it could not possibly work it.

I want, next, to take up the culm-dump cases. I doubt if there is a Member of this body who is not now impressed with the fact that Judge Archbald voluntarily and intentionally, after he became a member of the Commerce Court, went to work to do a wholesale business in culm dumps. That matter has been brought up in such a way, has been published so often, and so much has been said about it by the managers and otherwise, that it seems impossible that anybody should fail to have that impression. So it becomes my duty, as it is my pleasure as one of the counsel of Judge Archbald, to show to the Senate now from the testimony in the case and the correspondence with regard to it, that the statement is absolutely without a particle of foundation. I know that is a broad statement to make, but I make it unhesitatingly, and I expect to make good my word.

It was said in the opening statement of the managers and is charged in article 13 that Judge Archbald got numerous contracts and numerous agreements as to coal properties, and that in all of them he concealed from everybody, except the officials of the railroad company with which he was dealing, the fact that he was interested; that the railroad company knew it, and nobody else did. I say again there is not a particle of foundation for that statement, and I propose to make good those words. As a matter of fact, instead of Judge Archbald having made up his mind when he went on the Commerce Court bench that he would go into culm-dump transactions or other transactions with railroad companies which had cases or might have cases before the Commerce Court, the fact is that there are just two of those cases with which he had any connection. In one he took the initiative steps at the instance of a man who was sent to him by William P. Boland to get him to do it, and in the other instance he did it because he was seeking to purchase a dump which was held by a private concern with which no railroad company had the slightest connection; and it was suggested to him in that connection that instead of getting that dump by itself it would be better to get one near by which was under lease by a railroad company.

I repudiate the suggestion that has been made here by one of the managers that Judge Archbald, through his counsel, is seeking to hide behind the men who made these suggestions to him. It was said that I had made that remark in my opening statement in this case. I challenge the manager who is to conclude the argument of this case to find a suggestion or word which justifies that statement. What I did say was that it was not true, as was charged in the thirteenth article, that the respondent, being on the Commerce Court, conceived the idea of compelling the railroad companies which might have cases before him to make good bargains with him. Not a single instance of that kind occurred. In each of the two cases in question the idea of making the application originated in other brains, and the suggestion was made to him. What he did after that he is responsible for; but no one can read the testimony in this case and say that Judge Archbald himself conceived the idea and then acted accordingly.

Now, taking up these culm dump transactions, which are illustrated by the maps which are upon your wall, I am going to take up, first, article 3, which deals with a dump shown on the map which is on the left as we look at the door. That dump is known as Packer No. 3. On that map there are quite a number of dumps located. In the lower part of the map, in the middle, is what is called the Oxford washery and the Oxford dump, and right in the middle, where the black spot is, which you can see from all over the Chamber, is Packer No. 4. Up farther to the left is Packer No. 2, and to the right you will see a conglomeration of lines. There is a big letter "B" there; and to the left of that is a small dump which is eastern Packer No. 4, and to the right is Packer No. 3 dump.

I now take up the story as it is shown by the testimony in this case, as manifested by the written correspondence in evidence and by the testimony of witnesses that the managers have produced. The first witness on the subject to whose testimony I refer is John Henry Jones, who had heard of the Oxford dump from a man named Gray. That Oxford dump was the one which was controlled by a concern known as the Oxford Coal Co., and worked by another concern—Madeira, Hill & Co. I ask Senators to bear in mind that no railroad company had any connection with it whatever; it was a private concern; and Judge Archbald had just as much right to go and deal in regard to it as he had to go down to the grocery to buy supplies for his house.

John Henry Jones, after hearing of this dump, mentioned it to Judge Archbald, and requested the judge to get an option on it so that they might together see if they could make a sale of it and make some profit out of it. Judge Archbald accordingly communicated with the people who owned that dump, and he received a written option. There are a series of letters, first, one giving an option, and then others extending it, which will be found on pages 1203 and 1204 of the record. Then he and John Henry Jones tried to sell that dump. Jones tried to sell it to Mr. Peale, and the letter is in evidence by which he tried to get Peale to buy it, and it is found on page 1016 of the record.

Then, John Henry Jones says that Thomas H. Jones, who is known here as Star Jones, "asked me if I knew of a dump, saying he had a purchaser; and I told him about this Oxford dump"; and that is where Thomas H. Jones, or Star Jones, as he is known in this case, got into the matter. Here is his testimony:

John Henry Jones told me that the Oxford dump was for sale, and that he got his information from Judge Archbald. I offered it for sale, and it was turned down because it was too rocky.

John Henry Jones went on the dump, and this is his testimony, on pages 360 and 367:

The superintendent of the Oxford dump told me if I could get a dump across the way—

Across the creek, it means—that a fair operation could be made of it by bringing that coal to the Oxford washery. I examined the dump, and when I got back from that examination I told the judge that if Packer No. 3 could be obtained, it would be a fair operation.

That is the way Judge Archbald knew that there was such a thing in existence as Packer No. 3.

Mr. President, I now have demonstrated, as I started out to demonstrate, that the fact that there was such a dump as Packer No. 3 and that it would be a good thing to operate it was brought to the attention of Judge Archbald by another person with whom he was in cooperation on another dump, with which only private parties were connected.

The next thing that appears in the record in this connection is a letter from the judge to a man named Lathrop, dated August 1, 1911, which is found on page 643 of the record:

W. A. Lathrop, superintendent Lehigh Valley Coal Co.—

That shows how intimately Judge Archbald was concerned with this railroad company, because Lathrop had not been superintendent of that coal company for about 10 years. He wrote to Judge Archbald that he had not anything to do with it, and that Mr. Warriner was now the proper man to write to. But in that letter Judge Archbald says:

I have an option on this [Oxford] washery, and the culm dump which goes with it is not quite what it ought to be and ought to be strengthened with another.

So, you see the correspondence shows he was doing exactly what the oral testimony shows he was doing. He had been dealing for the Oxford; he had been told it was a good thing to get the Packer No. 3 to work with it; and he writes to the man who he supposed at that time was superintendent of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and asks if anything can be done about it.

The next is a letter to Mr. Warriner, which is precisely the same thing. The judge has found out now that Mr. Lathrop has nothing to do with it, and he writes to Mr. Warriner on the 11th of August, 1911, saying:

In negotiating with regard to that [Oxford] washery I find that it needs an additional dump, or will in the near future, and I am therefore writing to inquire whether any arrangement could be made with your company for one or more of the dumps which I have referred to.

Next you find a letter from the judge's nephew, Col. Archbald, the engineer of the Girard estate—and here I must remind the Senators that all these packer dumps belonged to the estate of Mr. Girard, the millionaire, who died and left a great charitable bequest to the city of Philadelphia. That estate is now managed by a corporation called the Board of City Trusts. That corporation had leased all these culm dumps, these Packer dumps, and a vast amount of other property to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., and the lease was to expire at the end of this year. Col. Archbald was the nephew of Judge Archbald and was the engineer of the Girard estate. The judge wrote to him on the 14th of August, 1911, as to the Oxford, saying:

I understand that lease runs out in two years. Will the Girard estate extend the time to cover the life of the dump?

This is a quotation from his letter:

I have written to the Lehigh Valley people to see whether I could get any arrangement with them about one or other of the adjoining dumps, but have not heard from them.

And, next, on the 27th of September, 1911, Mr. Warriner himself writes Judge Archbald—

I now have a report from our superintendent on the situation, and I think it will be possible for us to accede to your wishes.

And he suggests an interview between Judge Archbald and his, Mr. Warriner's, superintendent.

I ask you to observe from that that Mr. Warriner, when he had this application from Judge Archbald, a judge of the Commerce Court, in a letter written on Commerce Court paper, did not send for the judge to come over and have a talk with him and see how much money he wanted to make out of that dump. He made inquiries of his superintendent as to whether Packer No. 3 was one that he had better hold on to, and he suggested that the judge come over and have a talk with him and his superintendent. He says, further, in that letter that Mr. Humphrey, who was his superintendent, was present at the conference which followed. He says that he does not recollect positively that Mr. Humphrey recommended consenting to a lease of the dump, but, he says, to refer to his testimony on page 653—

We [Humphrey and himself] agreed upon a line of the proposed lease which would not interfere with our operation and would include only such coal as we had no intention of mining ourselves and did not consider it profitable to mine during the life of the lease, and that both Mr. Humphrey and myself were agreed upon that.

Then comes a letter from Col. Archbald to Judge Archbald, dated November 20, 1911, saying:

Neither of these banks is very good and would hardly warrant separate operation. It would pay the Oxford Coal Co. to take them, which is probably your idea.

As it was said, you see—

The board of directors—as these banks are not first class—may be willing to have them worked under Oxford rates if taken by the Oxford Coal Co.

Next comes the letter of November 22 from the judge to his nephew, saying:

I think probably that I will ask for a separate lease and not tie up with the Oxford people.

Now, as to Madeira, Hill & Co., the other people. It was stated here by the managers—and I do not like to criticize gentlemen of such high standing, and I know of such absolute fairness of intention—but they have stated a great many things in their arguments in this case as to what the evidence discloses that is erroneous. It was stated to the Senate by one of the managers, I have forgotten which, though I think by Mr. Manager STERLING, and if not by him by one of the other managers, perhaps by Mr. Manager WEBB, that Madeira, Hill & Co. made application to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. for this same Packer No. 3 dump, and offered to pay them a royalty on the coal in that dump of 10 cents and 5 cents, according to the size—chestnut and above or pea—and that instead of accepting that proposition they afterwards agreed to let the Girard estate, if it would, lease that same dump to Judge Archbald and his associates on paying a royalty of 1 or 2 cents.

Now, if that were true, it would be a very strong piece of evidence to show that the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. people were yielding something to Judge Archbald as a member of the Commerce Court, or in some other way. Whether it would tend to show that the judge knew that such influence was being exercised is another question. But it is not true; it is an absolute mistake. The letter to which counsel refers, page 659 in the record, is a letter from Madeira, Hill & Co. to Mr. Warriner, dated March 26, 1910, a year or more before Judge Archbald had any connection with these dumps, and that company applied for dump No. 4, and offered on that dump only 10 cents per ton on domestic sizes—that is, chestnut and over—and 5 cents on pea and buck in excess of the royalties that were to be paid to the Girard estate. The letter making this offer concludes:

If we can close on this, we will take up the consideration of No. 2 bank.

So here was the proposition that was made by Madeira, Hill & Co., who had been for a long time working that Oxford dump and had these dumps Nos. 2, 3, and 4 spread out on the opposite side of the creek, right in front of them. They saw these dumps, and applied for No. 4, and said if they got that they would think of applying for No. 2; but they made no application for No. 3, and why they made no application will appear before I have proceeded much further.

So Mr. Warriner wrote to Mr. Hill on the 3d of May, 1910, answering that letter, "We are inclined to believe that it is best to operate those banks ourselves," on account of certain complications. The complication, it appears, was a question of the difficulties of the Oxford Coal Co., if it washed that coal, shipping the coal over the rails of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.

Now, I said I would show the reasons not why they said they would give a dump to Judge Archbald, or consent that it might go to him, and would not consent that it go to Madeira, Hill & Co., but why they were unwilling that No. 2 and No. 4 should be leased and were willing that No. 3 should be taken.

Mr. Manager WEBB. I did not discuss that proposition at all; it was Judge STERLING, I guess.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I beg your pardon. Of course it was an inadvertent error, no matter who said it.

Now, Mr. Warriner gives at great length, at pages 659 to 661, the reasons why his company did not want to operate No. 3 bank itself. And Col. Archbald, who was not an employee of the coal company or the railroad company but of the Girard estate, gives the same reasons. Mr. Weller, who was the mine inspector of the Girard estate, gives the same testimony about it, and they all say this: In the first place, the coal in this dump was much poorer in quality and much harder to get out than in the other dumps. It was surrounded by a wall of rock. And they say that where the letter B is upon that map [indicating]—and you can see it from where I stand—the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. had dug a hole down into the mine below and had undertaken to use that coal, and after using or trying to use it for a short time found it was not merchantable and gave it up and abandoned it. And they all testified that that No. 3 dump would not stand any royalties except those that had to be paid to the Girard estate in any event.

Now, Mr. Humphrey was a witness, and I particularly ask your attention to his testimony. He was the chief mining engineer of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. at the time he was examined, but at the time of these transactions he was their division superintendent, he having in the meantime been promoted. He says that before Judge Archbald came to that meeting at which he was present with Mr. Warriner, Mr. Warriner had referred to him the question whether it would be a good thing to lease No. 3, and he said:

I advised leasing it because of the inferior location and quality of the coal and the distance from the breaker and the large rock bank between the breaker and the dump, and the first I knew that Judge Archbald was interested was when he came to the office after I had made my recommendation.

Now, gentlemen, there is a case in which Mr. Warriner, in charge for this coal company of this Packer No. 3 dump, which they had tried to work and concluded they would not work because it would not pay, as the coal was so inferior, and had let it stay there year after year, and the lease was about running out, when they would have to pay additional royalties if they could get it at all, and he says to his trusted superintendent and adviser, "You go and look at that dump and let me know what you think about it and what we should do about it." Mr. Humphrey, who did not even know that Judge Archbald, or any other judge, was concerned or supposed to be concerned in the transaction, goes and examines this property and comes back to his chief and says, "I think it will be a good thing for you to get rid of that dump if you can."

The result was that the whole matter was referred to the Board of City Trusts of the Girard estate, Mr. Warriner saying, in writing—and the letter is in evidence—that he would be willing to let them lease No. 3 dump to anybody upon paying to his company a royalty of one or two cents on all the coal.

In the offer which was made by Madeira, Hill & Co. for the much better dumps, Nos. 2 and 4, they had offered to pay a greater royalty, but on the larger sizes only. This was an offer to pay a royalty on all sizes; and I am advised that if you look at the two transactions and estimate the royalty at 10 and 5 cents on the larger sizes only and take the royalty of 1 and 2 cents on all the sizes, as those sizes are shown to have existed in that dump, it will reach as much, if not more, under the last proposition than under the first.

That is the transaction in relation to Packer No. 3 dump, and you can judge from that whether it appears that Judge Archbald made up his mind that he would go to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. or the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which the railroad company controlled, and try to drive a good bargain, or that the company on account of that influence undertook to give him a good bargain.

Now, I take up next the second of these two culm-pile transactions, that relating to the Katydid dump. I venture again to suggest that there is not a Senator who is listening to what I say who has not a pretty firm conviction that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary of the Erie Railroad Co., had agreed to sell to Judge Archbald a dump which was worth a large amount of money for a very small consideration. But I say it will appear that that idea, too, from whatever source it may have come, is absolutely without the slightest foundation.

In the first place, this dump was not sold at all. The only piece of evidence is a letter from Capt. May to Mr. Williams, dated the 30th of August, which I wish to read to the Senate. Every manager who has spoken in this case, I believe, unless it be Mr. Manager HOWLAND—and he did not refer at all to the facts in the case, but dealt with the law—has told you, unless I am much mistaken, that after the visit which Judge Archbald made to Mr. Brownell, the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. agreed to sell to Judge Archbald the Katydid dump. It never did. This whole case, so far as article No. 1 is concerned, rests upon this letter dated August 30, 1911, addressed to Williams and signed by May:

(Pennsylvania Coal Co., Hillside Coal & Iron Co., New York; Susquehanna & Western Coal Co., Northwestern Mining & Exchange Co., and Blossburg Coal Co.)

OFFICE OF THE GENERAL MANAGER,
Scranton, Pa., August 30, 1911.

Mr. E. J. WILLIAMS,
626 South Blakely Street, Dunmore, Pa.

DEAR SIR: As stated to you to-day verbally, I shall recommend the sale of whatever interest the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. has in what is known as the Katydid culm dump, made by Messrs. Robertson & Law in the operation of the Katydid breaker, for $4,500.

In order that it may not be lost sight of, I will mention that any coal above the size of pea coal will be subject to a royalty to the owners of lot 46, upon the surface of which the bank is located.

It is also understood that the bank will not be conveyed to anyone else without the consent of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and that if the offer is accepted articles of agreement will be drawn to cover the transaction.

Yours, very truly,
W. A. MAY,
General Manager.

So that all that Capt. May did was to say that he, to his superiors, would recommend the sale of his company's interest in this dump. Now, what is the Katydid dump?

I may say before I proceed with this that the statement which the managers made to the House and the statement which they made here, and which they started out to prove here by Mr. Rittenhouse, was that the Katydid bank was of the value of $47,000, or, under a certain probable contingency, between three and four thousand dollars more. In other words, that for $4,500 to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and $3,500 to Robertson, or $8,000 in all, Judge Archbald acquired the ownership of a piece of property which was worth $52,000. That is what they stated to the House when they asked the House to impeach Judge Archbald. That is what Mr. Manager CLAYTON read to you in his opening statement, quoting what had been said to the House of Representatives. They put Mr. Rittenhouse on the stand to prove it. But we had not proceeded very far in this case when Mr. Manager STERLING, on behalf of his brother managers, rose in his seat here and moved to strike out the evidence of Mr. Rittenhouse and all the evidence in the case as to the value of this property, stating it was a wholly immaterial matter whether it was of any value or not.

We shall see why that extraordinary change of front occurred. Mr. Robertson was on the stand when that motion was made. He was one of the first witnesses examined by us. Mr. Robertson was the man who made that dump. You have heard the explosions, if I may use that word without affront to the managers here, in reference to the proposition that no railroad company controlling land ever let go its property to other people; that they hold on to it like grim death; that if anybody gets one of their coal claims from them it must mean that some improper influence has been used.

Senators, in the year 1885 this very Katydid property was leased by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to Mr. Robertson. The property with which you are dealing in this first article is a piece of property which the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. let go of 25 or more years ago.

Again, as my associate reminds me, in 1901, in a letter which is in evidence, the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. confirmed that arrangement and fixed the royalties which Mr. Robertson was to pay the company for mining its coal. Only four or five hundred feet away to-day and for years past the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. has that great operation which was referred to here as the Consolidated mine. They have their machinery there working that great operation.

They leased this part of that property to Mr. Robertson, who was not a member of the Commerce Court, or of any other court, but a plain, industrious man, who was trying to make a living in the coal business; and he operated that Katydid mine, and in the operation thereof made the Katydid dump; and under the decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, which nobody disputes, that Katydid dump belonged to the man who made it.

They talk here about the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. selling that dump to Judge Archbald. They could not sell it to anybody. They had their royalty rights in it and they had nothing more.

Mr. Robertson tells you that they began their operations on that mine in 1885 or 1886 and continued working it until 1908, Mr. Law coming in with him, under the firm name of Robertson & Law, for a few years in the middle of the term. Law went out again and Robertson continued the work alone until 1908. In 1908, on account of some operations of another coal company, the Delaware & Hudson, in the immediate vicinity, something happened which cut off Robertson's supply of water and he could not go on with his washery operations, which he had begun in 1905 and had continued for three years. He could not go on more than two hours a day, because he could not get the water. He therefore stopped his washery. A few months afterwards, in the latter part of 1908, the breaker and the washery all burned down.

Mr. Robertson, as well as Judge Knapp, an eminent lawyer in Scranton, who testified concerning this matter and was counsel for the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., tells us that Robertson did not resume the mining operation because he had nearly worked out the piece of property which he had leased from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. Thus Robertson was left with the Katydid dump on his hands.

Now, what happened? Mr. Robertson was the man who had been from 1905 to 1908 using the washery on that dump, reclaiming the small sizes of coal, which have become valuable in these later years. He started to work the oldest part, which, as he says, and as everybody says, is the best part of all the dumps, when the fire occurred and burned down his washery, as well as his breaker. Why did he not rebuild it? Because, he says, it would not pay to build a washery there. There was not enough coal left to justify it. His foreman, Mr. Monie, who was there running this operation for him all these years, we brought here and put upon the witness stand, and he confirmed Mr. Robertson in every one of the particulars I have stated in regard to what happened in reference to the Katydid dump. He says that they ran out of water and that besides, after the fire, the dump could not be operated to advantage.

What happened then? Robertson, having that Katydid dump on his hands, and knowing that there was no money in it, because he knew almost every piece of coal that was in it, he made it, having the advice of his foreman, who had made it for him and under his eyes, knowing that it would not pay to build a washery there, that he would never get back the money spent on it if he did, then went to work trying to find somebody to whom he could sell it. In the early part of 1909 he found the Du Pont Powder Co. wanted to buy a coal dump, because they were proposing to establish a plant there in their business. He immediately got into communication with the Du Pont Powder Co. He first went to Capt. May and said to Capt. May, "Now, this dump we want to sell; I think I have a purchaser to take it off our hands, and I propose to sell it for $10,000. I will take $8,000 of the $10,0000 and you may take $2,000." Capt. May said to him, "Go ahead; I will recommend that."

That was in the early part of 1909. So Robertson testifies, so May testifies, so do Mr. Belin and Mr. Saum, Belin being the representative of the Du Pont Powder Co. and Saum their expert, who had investigated the bank at that time for Belin.

So you see that in the early part of 1909 Capt. May was willing to dispose of the interest of his company in this dump and to recommend exactly what he has done here, and all he has done here, saying "I will recommend the sale of the interest of my company in that dump for $2,000."

So Mr. Robertson, having the authority of Capt. May to sell the dump for $10,000—$8,000 for himself and $2,000 only to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.—went to Mr. Belin and said to him, "You can buy that dump for $8,000." Belin said, "Will I get the Hillside Co.'s interest as well as yours?" "Yes, sir." Then he went to Mr. Saum and asked him to investigate the dump and let him know whether it was worth $10,000. Mr. Saum did make the examination, and Mr. Belin said because of that report and because at the same time his company found it could make a good arrangement in another way to get their power without manufacturing it themselves, they gave up the idea of buying.

That left Mr. Robertson in the early part of 1909 with this great $50,000 piece of property on his hands, and he could not get rid of it for anything to anybody. He went time and again, as he testified and as May testified, to Capt. May trying to sell his interest to May's company. May would not buy it. He would not make any offer for it at all.

It seems to me, Senators, that I ought not to have to go a step further to show there is nothing in this proposition about the Katydid dump and the sale of a valuable piece of property to Judge Archbald for the benefit of his prospective influence as a judge in the Commerce Court, but I propose to go on and show the other testimony to show that there can not be any possible question about that, to show why the honorable managers, when this question was entered upon by us, after this impeachment had been obtained by the statement that that property had been sold to Judge Archbald for $8,000 which was worth $52,000, and how the honorable managers wished to get the whole matter out of the case.

Mr. Law says that during the time he was with Robertson he observed that they were building a pile of ashes there. Robertson and his foreman Monie have both testified to that. I have not referred to it as I went along, but on that map of the Katydid you see on the wall, down on the southwest corner, there is a very considerable proportion of it. That is marked and named there conical dump. Mr. Robertson, Mr. Monie, and Mr. Law all say that that was where they dumped their ashes from their works for 15 or 16 years or longer, and after they had dumped the ashes there, or while they were dumping the ashes there, they removed a large amount of rock, not coal mixed with rock, but rock, where they had for some reason in their mining operation to take out a quantity of rock. They piled that on the ashes, and on top of the ashes and the rock there had been some coal, and when Mr. Robertson had been working his washery between 1905 and 1908 he washed the coal that was there, so far as he could get at it, and left nothing but the very fine refuse that was not worth anything. That is the conical dump which contains some 15,000 or 16,000 tons, according to the testimony of all those who measured it. Mr. Monie and Mr. Robertson and Mr. Law all concur about that.

There is another thing. You see upon that map one place that has the legend upon it, Slush bank. The testimony shows that that was the place where they had made a pile of absolute rock. Nobody claims that that was any part of the coal dump, but the testimony shows that that bank which is all rock, with some slush put on top of rock, and that is the reason they call it slush bank, was made at the same time the coal dump was made.

Everybody knows if you empty from vehicles material of rock, coal, or dirt, or sand, forming a dump, it will spread at a certain slope in all directions as you go along. Mr. Rittenhouse, in making his estimate, supposed that coal dump to have that slope there, and did not know what these witnesses testified to, that the coal dump was built side by side with the rock dump at the same time, so that a line between them would be practically a vertical one.

Mr. Frank A. Johnson, who was the general coal inspector of the Hillside Co. and has worked around the Consolidated breaker, which was near this dump, said he was on that Katydid dump ground daily for 17 or 18 years, and on the conical dump he saw them working a great part of it the second time.

Mr. Petersen, who managed that consolidated operation for the Hillside Co. and was in the employ of that company for over 25 years and has been engaged in mining in all its departments, including washeries, says he knew the Katydid dump quite well, and when asked what it was worth said, "I would give five or six thousand dollars for it." He saw Robertson working when he was operating his washery there between 1905 and 1908, and said that he had worked the best part of the dump.

Mr. Saum, the expert to whom I have referred, who was employed by Mr. Berlin, of the Du Pont Powder Co., after the dump had been offered to him for $10,000, first went and made cursory examination of it in February or March, 1909. A little later than that he went there again. He first figured out that the value of what was there was about $33,000. According to the testimony of the experts it would cost nearly that or more than that to build the washery itself. Mr. Saum himself, who was employed in this matter, you will remember, by Mr. Berlin, of the Du Pont Powder Co., and for it only, no railroad ghost pervading the atmosphere in any degree at that time, told Mr. Berlin it would cost $35,000 to put in a proper and complete washery to handle that property, which he said was worth only $36,000, and that the cost of operation in addition to that would be about $15,000. If you add the $35,000 for the cost of the plant and the fifteen thousand and odd dollars for the cost of operation and the $8,000 which Judge Archbald and Mr. Williams were to pay for the dump, you will find that whoever took and operated it on that basis would lose the sum of twenty-two thousand and odd dollars.

He says in that calculation he included that conical dump as all coal. He did not know it was a pile of rock and ashes and that there was nothing there that was worth anything.

The next man who testified about that dump was this same Thomas H. Jones, to whom I referred in connection with Packer No. 3 dump. On the 6th of April, 1912, he got a written option from Judge Archbald, offering to sell him that dump for $25,000; and he was trying to find a purchaser for it. He went there with three other men to examine that dump and he said the estimate was that there were about 22,000 tons of coal there, which would be worth, at the rate fixed by all these experts, less than the $8,000, which was to be paid by Judge Archbald for the dump if he got it. He said, "I then went and I told Williams, if you get me an option on it I will get a competent engineer to make an estimate." He says Williams said that there was a great deal more coal in it than Mr. Jones thought there was, and it was then they went to Judge Archbald and got the option.

Then Mr. Reese Alonzo Davis went there with Jones. He said that he—Davis—had a purchaser named Beardslee. He went there with Beardslee and Jones to make a sale. He was trying to get a commission by selling to somebody. Beardslee went with him and looked at it, and he—Davis—said he thought there were 20,000 tons of fair coal there. Beardslee said he would not take it as a gift. Then Jones got a man named Motiska, a mining engineer, to go there, and Motiska made an estimate of 68,000 gross tons, and told Jones how much coal he could get out of it. Then Jones concluded there was no money in it; he dropped it.

Beardslee, who was the next witness on the stand, said he was in the business of washing coal dumps. He wanted to get such a dump. He was told this Katydid dump could be got at a reasonable price, and he went with Jones and Davis to look at it. He said it was too small to warrant an operation at all; that it would not pay for building a washery.

In addition to that, he could not see that he could get any water, and when he was asked what it would cost to furnish the water to run it he said he did not see where he could get it at all. He was in exactly the same plight as Robertson was when he stopped work. There was no water there to wash the dump, and probably it would cost as much to get water there for that purpose, without regard to what the machinery would cost, as the coal in the dump was worth.

Another gentleman who examined that dump was Mr. Thomas Ellsworth Davis. He has been a mining engineer for nearly 30 years. He is the official appraiser at the present time of coal properties for taxation for the counties of Lackawanna and Luzerne, and he is the consulting engineer on that subject of the State tax board. He tells you he examined that dump about the same time these other parties did, and the value in his opinion was about $2,500 to $3,000. He went there to examine it for some people who wanted to buy it, and he said he reported to them not to touch it.

Frank A. Johnson was still another witness on this point. He was inspector of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.. I am coming down to what is most important in regard to this question. When Judge Archbald wrote his letter of March 31, 1911, to Capt. May asking him whether his company would sell the Katydid culm dump and at what price, Capt. May immediately directed an examination to be made of that dump. That letter is here in evidence, and upon the letter were the notations he made as to the directions he gave.

Mr. Johnson went there at the direction of Capt. May with a man named Merriman. Merriman was the man who was to find out how much material there was in the dump. That was his business. Johnson was the man to see what kind of coal there was, how much coal, and what sizes. So the combined information they would give Capt. May would let him know what that dump was worth to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.—what amount in royalties the company might expect to get out of it.

Johnson went there with Merriman. He says when he went there he did not know whether that bank was to be bought or whether it was to be sold. His chief, Capt. May, said, "Go there and examine that dump with Merriman and find out what there is in it and find out what it is worth, and make your report to me." So he and Merriman went there to inform their superior officer what that dump was worth, not having the slightest idea what was to be done, whether he wanted to buy or whether he wanted to sell.

He described that conical dump and tells about the rock there. He knew about that. Merriman left it out; he knew all about it. Then they made their report to Capt. May that there were about 55,000 tons of gross material in the dump, and Mr. Merriman made a blue print, in which he gave the representation of that dump the same as the map there, except on a smaller scale, and except also that he left out the conical dump. He figured on it and stated at the bottom what the 55,000 tons gross meant, using the same language there from which the managers have contended that that meant 55,000 tons of coal. I shall address myself, as I go along, to that proposition and show there is nothing in it.

Mr. Johnson was one of the men who made that report, and he says he told the captain there were 55,000 tons altogether, and that that is what Mr. Merriman reported. Mr. Merriman is dead and we can not have the benefit of his testimony.

The next witness on the subject is Mr. Jennings, general inspector of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., who built the Consolidated and was in charge of it from March, 1909, until the present time. He went to the Katydid with May in the latter part of May, 1911. Here is another employee of Capt. May's, his general inspector. These two people, of whom I have already spoken, Merriman and Johnson, went there in April immediately after the receipt of Judge Archbald's letter of March 31. Jennings went there with Capt. May in the latter part of May, 1911.

He had an idea that some day Robertson would rebuild and undertake to wash that dump. We know it is not so, because Robertson had washed it for awhile and knew what was in it, and knew that it would not pay to build a washery, and, as he told you on the witness stand, that is the reason he did not resume work.

Jennings says:

I told him that when Robertson & Law started again to wash that dump all we would get would be the royalty we would pay—

"We." The record should read "they"— and it was just a question with us of waiting to get our money by actual shipment or taking the money—that is, we had a very unstable agreement upon which we operated this mining, at least a part of it, on lot 46; and if we sold it, it would be off our hands and we would have the money.

And at that time—

Says Mr. Jennings—

I krew nothing as to Judge Archbald having any communication with Capt. May about this matter.

Now, here again, as in the case of Packer No. 3, you find the man who was in charge of this dump taking his most trusted and reliable advisers, asking them to give him information as to the value of the interest of his company in the property, and not letting them know who it was for whom he was getting information or what his object was in getting it, and they all three of them concur practically that the property is not worth anything and he had better get out of it what he could.

Therefore, when this report was submitted to Capt. May, there was simply presented to him the proposition, "We have the right to royalty on the coal that is in that dump that will come out of it if anybody can be induced to go to the expense of building a washery; and if nobody does build a washery, we will get nothing out of it.

On that map of Mr. Merriman's which is in evidence are figures made by Capt. May showing how he got the value of that royalty. He figured it that the value of his company's interest was $6,000. Capt. May testified, and Mr. Williams has testified, that when Williams went to May on the last days of August to get this letter from May, Capt. May then demanded $6,000, and Williams beat him down to $4,500; and on those same figures Capt. May has added the $3,500 which was to be paid to Robertson.

Now, bear in mind this further fact, Senators. When, in February or March, 1909, Robertson and May together had offered that property to the powder company for $10,000, Robertson to have $8,000, May being willing to take $2,000, Robertson, who made that dump and knew what was in it, in 1911 had come down from $8,000, which was his former price, to $3,500, which he asked Judge Archbald for it; and Capt. May, who was terribly influenced by the overwhelming power of a judge of the Commerce Court, and who had offered to sell in the spring of 1909 the interest of his company, their royalties, for $2,000, demanded $4,500 from the judge of the Commerce Court, and put that in his letter. If that is the effect of judicial influence in obtaining favors, I pray I may never have the benefit of it.

Capt. May says the engineers reported 55,000 tons of material—not 55,000 tons of coal—in the dump. It is a curious thing that all through the taking of the testimony in this regard the learned managers, and especially Mr. Manager STERLING, who seemed to have charge of the examination of witnesses about this particular dump, insisted that that 55,000 tons meant 55,000 tons of coal. I have shown by the testimony of all these witnesses that it was 55,000 tons gross, not more than half of which would be coal. If that be so, on the testimony of every witness in this case it would not pay to build a washery to reclaim it.

But later in the taking of the testimony in this case the report of Mr. Rittenhouse, upon which they have relied from beginning to end as to the value of this dump, was formally put in evidence by consent, and in that report, as the managers will find on page 1050, Mr. Rittenhouse himself says that these engineers reported to Capt. May that the dump contained 55,000 tons gross and not 55,000 tons of coal.

I want to go on to the history of this transaction. They found a purchaser. How they found a purchaser we will consider a little later, but Mr. Conn, who was the representative of the line running from Wilkes-Barre to Scranton, called the Laurel line, became a prospective purchaser of this dump. There is a contract in evidence here by which, if the title had proved satisfactory, he would have taken it, and he agreed to pay 27½ cents a ton for the coal in it.

I take the report of Mr. Rittenhouse, which included that conical dump and included the coal which he supposed to be in the slope to which I referred a few minutes ago, making 25,000 tons more of coal than was actually in the dump. At his figure, taking the whole quantity of coal thus found to be in that dump at 27½ cents a ton, which Conn was to pay, the total amount would have been $14,000; there would have been a profit of $6,000, and that is the most that can be figured out of this transaction that Judge Archbald and Mr. Williams could have received in any possible event.

Conn would not pay any lump sum; he was on his guard. All that the venders would have received under that contract would have been $10,000, or a profit of $1,000 each to Mr. Williams and Judge Archbald.

Now I come to another step in this case, and one upon which the managers have relied here as they relied on it when they made their report to the House, copied it and read it in the opening statement which is made here to you, and they have repeated it time and again in your hearing, and I have no doubt it has influenced the mind of every Member of this body who has been here and heard what was said about it. Why, the managers exclaim they sold this dump to Mr. Bradley for $20,000, making a profit of $12,000, of which sum $6,000 was to go into the pocket of Judge Archbald.

Now, let us see. Mr. Bradley is a plain man. I wish you all had seen him. I do not know how many of those who are listening to me saw him on the stand. I venture to say that nobody who did see him would question his absolute truthfulness. He said he went down to see that dump at the instance of Mr. Williams, and concluded it was worth $16,000 after hearing what Williams had to say about it. Then he went back to the office of William P. Boland, and there Williams and William P. Boland made him think it was worth more and he agreed to pay $20,000 for it.

How was that done? Why, said Williams and Boland to Bradley, "Jones is going to buy that dump for $25,000"—this same Jones who had a 10-day option for $25,000—the same Jones who went down there with his friend as a purchaser to see what it was worth, and the friend who proposed to be a purchaser would not take the dump as a gift. "But," said Boland and Williams to Bradley, and Bradley himself tells us this, "Why, you can sell this dump to Jones for $25,000. He has got a man who will pay $25,000 for it, and if you will get it for $20,000 you will make $5,000." Mr. Dainty was there at the same time, and Mr. Bradley, the honest fellow, tells you, "I was to get that, and I was going to give Dainty $2,000 and keep the other $3,000 myself. That was the profit I was to have out of it." Mr. Bradley tells you that William P. Boland was the first man who spoke to him about that dump or about his buying it, and that "he urged me to buy and he told me it was worth more than $16,000. He hurried me along. I went down to the dump one day, and the next day we went over to Capt. May to see if it was all right."

Now, mark this: These men had made that poor fellow Bradley understand, as he says, that there were from eighty to a hundred thousand tons of coal in that dump; so he says; and he proceeded upon that basis when he made that proposition—that there were eighty or a hundred thousand tons of coal there—when, according to the exaggerated estimate even of Mr. Rittenhouse, the man who put the greatest value on the dump, there were between eighty-five and ninety thousand tons of stuff there altogether.

Was there a sale to Bradley? Not at all. Says Mr. Bradley: "I did not intend to complete the transaction until I went to see my lawyer, and I never got far enough." He never did see the lawyer. Of course, if he had, the result would have been the same as it was when they were trying to sell to Mr. Conn.

Inasmuch as that Rittenhouse report is the only thing relied upon in the House or here to show that that property was worth forty-five or fifty thousand dollars, I must devote a little more attention to it than I have already done. I think I have shown by testimony that is overwhelming that Rittenhouse's testimony could not be considered at all—that this dump was practically worth nothing. The testimony of the man who made it and his foreman alone would be sufficient for that; but let us look at Rittenhouse's report.

The very first item that he has in the report is an item of chestnut coal, which he appraises at $3.25 a ton, and makes of that the enormous total of $17,800.25. Now, by the testimony of a dozen witnesses, it is shown that there was no chestnut coal in that dump that was worth anything and that in none of these dumps is the chestnut worth anything; so that that $17,800.25 will have to be struck from the report. When these dumps were being made the chestnut coal was of a marketable size; nobody took and threw into a dump lumps of coal the size of chestnut and above which were all coal and were always valuable. It was only when it was mixed with bone or rock or some substance which made it impossible to handle it in the original size that it was thrown into the dump.

Mr. Robertson was working that very dump for three years, and working the oldest part of it, which everybody concedes was the best part of it. The managers themselves did concede that over and over again. Robertson could not market a particle of chestnut out of the best part of that dump for the reason that it cost more to separate it than it would amount to. He said all the coal in that dump was very small—"No. 3 buck" and smaller; he could not get anything larger than "buck No. 1." John Monie, Robertson's foreman, says, "We tried chestnut, and we failed utterly; we just stopped trying to make it, and we run the stuff back into the bank." Frank A. Johnson, the coal inspector of the Hillside Co., said it was impossible to run the larger sizes. Robertson failed to do it, and his report was that that bank contained five-tenths or one-half of 1 per cent of chestnut and three-tenths of 1 per cent of pea.

Capt. May, who, of course, knew all about that dump and its contents, says there is no marketable chestnut in the Katydid; and Mr. Jennings, the general inspector of the Hillside, says you can not do anything with the chestnut; the proportion of coal is so small you can not clean it on account of the amount of machinery required to do it. Mr. Saums, who was Mr. Belin's expert, says he had never found it practicable to work dump coal and clean it and get chestnut out of it. He included coal larger than pea, he says in his report to Belin, because he was estimating the coal, slate, and culm all mixed together. He says Belin asked him to put a value on it, and therefore he had to classify it. Mr. Reese Davis, who went to look at the Katydid, could see no pea or chestnut. Mr. Ellsworth Davies said there was about one-half or 2 per cent of chestnut there. Petersen, who ran the consolidated dump and its washery, also said when they started the Katydid they tried to win chestnut to make it pay, but because there was so much impurity and waste to be handled in proportion to the small amount of coal it was not commercially feasible.

The most remarkable thing of all is that Mr. Rittenhouse himself, who in his report puts the chestnut coal in the dump at $17,500 or thereabouts, says it would hardly be worth while to put the screens all on for the small quantity of larger sizes.

I think that I have demonstrated by the mouths of numerous witnesses and out of the written report of Mr. Rittenhouse himself, upon which alone the managers have relied to fix a great value on this Katydid dump, that the item of seventeen thousand and odd dollars which he puts in as the value of the chestnut coal in that dump must be stricken from it entirely; and it is not worth while to deal with or to consider at all the rest of his figures.

Now, I have come to a different matter from the consideration of the value of the Katydid dump, and I must ask the pardon of the Senate for having devoted so much time to it, because it seemed to me, in view of the numerous statements which have been made outside and which must have reached the ears of Senators, and the statements on this subject which have been made to the House, which come before you in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and those which have been made here in the opening statement of Mr. Manager CLAYTON, that there must be lodged in your minds the idea that this Katydid dump, instead of being a worthless pile of refuse was a piece of property of great value. But I come now to consider other matters.

I want, in the first place, to take up the visit that Judge Archbald made to Mr. Brownell, the general counsel of the Erie Railroad Co. One of the managers—and I am sure that it was Mr. Manager WEBB—in reference to a letter which Judge Archbald wrote to Mr. Brownell in the latter part of July, 1911, asking for an appointment, undertook to convey the idea that there was something about that letter of a mysterious and secret character. As an evidence of that, he said it was not written on Commerce Court paper. It would be a curious thing for Judge Archbald, in writing to Mr. Brownell, the general counsel of the company, who he is said to have wished to influence by his judicial position, should omit to use Commerce Court paper, when he used it in writing to everybody else; but, as a matter of fact, the learned manager is mistaken.

The letter, as anybody may see by examining it here in the hands of the Secretary, is on Commerce Court paper, and as the letter is printed in the record, at page 216, the printed heading of the Commerce Court is there.

It has been assumed here by the managers that prior to the time Judge Archbald went to see Mr. Brownell Capt. May had refused to sell this property. There is no testimony to justify that statement. Capt. May never did refuse. As we have seen, he started this investigation on March 31 and was continuing it down into the month of May. Then Mr. William P. Boland, who had suggested to Mr. Williams, in the first instance, to go to Judge Archbald and get a letter to Capt. May, said to Mr. Williams—and this William P. Boland testifies to himself—"I said to Williams, Go to Judge Archbald and get him to go to the New York office of the Erie Co." I do not mention that as any defense of Judge Archbald if he did anything that he should not do in going to see Mr. Brownell but as showing again that he never conceived the idea himself of going to the headquarters of the Erie Railroad Co. for the purpose of influencing its officials. And what story did Williams tell when he came to Judge Archbald to get him to do that? "Why," he said, "Judge Archbald, there was some trouble about the title of this Katydid dump, and Judge Willard"—then a member of the firm of Willard, Warren & Knapp, in Scranton—"had examined that title and made a report on it, and there has never been any final determination of the matter." Then he suggested to Judge Archbald that he might go to the headquarters of the company and find out what was the result of that inquiry as to the title of the company. So Judge Archbald went to see Mr. Brownell, to learn what had become of the investigation that was being made or had been started in reference to the title of the Katydid dump.

There is no word of testimony in this case that justifies the statement that has been made over and over again that when Judge Archbald did act upon that suggestion and went to see Mr. Brownell he knew that anything had taken place between Mr. Richardson and Capt. May in the month of June preceding in reference to advice by Richardson to May to let the matter drop for the present. Mr. Brownell says that when the judge came there, what he said to him and all he said to him was that he understood the matter of clearing up the title had been referred to him, Brownell. That fits in exactly with the testimony as to what Williams said to Judge Archbald and as to Judge Archbald's reason for going to see Mr. Brownell. He said he understood the matter of clearing up the title had been referred to him, Brownell, and he wondered if that was what was holding up the matter of the disposal of the interest of the Hillside in that dump. And Richardson says that when Brownell brought the judge in to see him the latter told him that he wanted to know the result. He says he did not promise the judge anything. He simply said he would see the general manager, just as he told everybody else making such communications; that there was no change in Mr. May's mind about the matter, so far as he, Richardson, knew; that Richardson simply said to May to take it up again and see what could be done with it.

The principal reason why May favored it was this—and now I call your attention to this small matter, which might make very little impression upon you and in which you might think perhaps there was no point—"Why," says Capt. May," I wanted to sell that property so as to see my friend Robertson get his money out of it."

Capt. May from the beginning to the end was always in favor of selling the property; nobody suggests that he ever changed his mind about it. When Mr. Robertson was upon the stand he testified that he would not allow this property to be sold to anybody who was not satisfactory to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. If anybody wanted to get his interest in that dump, he had first to make his peace with the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., because he was not going to make any trouble for his friend, Capt. May. Capt. May told you that, when the question of selling it came up and he saw that Robertson could make $3,500 out of it, he was very anxious to have it sold so that Robertson could get his money. Can you not see the picture of these two lifelong friends, one of them working the dump and paying the royalties and the other receiving the royalties and distributing them, meeting each other on the streets of Scranton day after day for 20 long years, working about this business, each thinking of and respecting the other, and neither of them wanting to make trouble for the other? Robertson would not sell to anybody that May was not satisfied with, and May was very anxious that the property should be sold so that his friend Robertson would get the money he never would get unless somebody else took charge of that dump, because Robertson himself knew that there was not enough money in it to justify the erection of a washery.

Now, another thing about this. It does not appear that Capt. May or Mr. Brownell or Mr. Richardson ever knew that Judge Archbald was financially interested in the purchase of this property. Every one of them says that Judge Archbald never told him in what regard he was acting, whether for himself or as representing somebody else who wanted to buy it. Each one of them explicitly makes that statement, and they all say that they would—Capt. May says explicitly he would—have sold at the same price to anybody. Robertson says the same thing. They have both testified on this stand that anybody can go there and have that dump now for $4,500 so far as Capt. May is concerned, and for $3,500 so far as Robertson is concerned.

As to the price of this dump, Capt. May never had a word or communication, verbally or otherwise, with Mr. Richardson about the price that was to be charged for their royalty interest in that piece of waste stuff they called the Katydid coal dump. Mr. May got the reports from his subordinates, and he determined that he would recommend the sale for $4,500. He was an officer of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. He was not connected with the Erie Co. in any way directly, although his company, of course, was owned by the Erie Co. He did not know that the Erie Railroad Co. had any litigation in the Commerce Court, and he never heard about the Lighterage case nor the fuel case, nor any of this other litigation, till this investigation began.

Thus you have, in the first place, a piece of property that was not worth anything; that would not be worked; out of which no royalties could be got, and Capt. May, finding out what the royalties would be worth if somebody would work it, offered to sell the interest of his company, as much as anything else, so that his friend Robertson could get his money out of it, he himself fixing the price of those royalties without knowing that there was any litigation in the Commerce Court in which the Erie Co. was concerned.

Mr. Richardson says that he never changed his attitude about the matter. He uses that expression: "I did not change my attitude. I did not know whether Judge Archbald was interested for himself or others. I did not know he was financially interested. I knew nothing of the Erie lighterage case."

Mr. Richardson, when he spoke to Capt. May in June and told him to take up the matter again and report on it, did not know anything about the Lighterage case that was pending in the Commerce Court. He says: "I might or might not have approved May's recommendation. No sale would stand without my approval. I simply told him to go on with the investigation and report to me. I have received no report. I did not tell May what my recommendation would be. I did not see how he could give the option, the interest was so small; and when he told me in June of overtures that were being made by somebody for the purchase of that dump he did not call my attention to the fact that Judge Archbald was the person who was interested."

It seems to me that we are pretty near to the end of the proposition that Judge Archbald went to the office of the Erie Railroad Co., and they directed this property to be sold to him, because he was a judge of the Commerce Court.

I want, now, to consider for a few moments this remarkable man and witness, Mr. Edward J. Williams. He was put upon the stand by the managers and examined by them and cross-examined by us. A few days ago one of the managers, Mr. Manager WEBB, I think it was—you will find this recorded on page 972—said, "We disclaim Williams as our witness." I had made some remark to the effect that Mr. Williams was their witness, and he said, "We disclaim him." Well, he certainly was not our witness; we never offered him here as a person upon whose testimony we asked you to rely in any degree whatever. The managers disclaim him, and I do not see how anything can be done with his testimony except to throw it out of court. But I will suppose that you may take a different view about it, and I will consider him for a moment.

There is one thing that can be said about Williams, and that is that he was an impartial witness. As to everything, I think, which was material in his testimony he testified distinctly and clearly on both sides. He said, on page 136, that the judge told him he would see Brownell about it, and on the next page he says that the judge did not tell him he would see Brownell about it. On page 139 he said he got an option one or two weeks after seeing him. Now, as illustrating the value of Mr. Williams's testimony—and I do not wish to be severe upon the old man; I have my own ideas about him—he took that letter of Judge Archbald's to Capt. May on the 31st of March, 1911; he went back to May and got the letter which I read, in which May says he will recommend the sale of his company's interest, on the 30th of August following—April, May, June, July, August—five months had intervened, and yet when Mr. Williams is asked how long it was from the time he went with the first letter until he got the option, he says, "It was one or two weeks." That is to be found on page 139 of the record in this case. Then he says that Judge Archbald never said that he would hurt Capt. May, or anything like that. On page 138, when the words were forcibly put in his month on the ground that the managers had a right to cross-examine him, he says he did say it. That is on page 166.

There is another matter which illustrates the value of his testimony, and it is more striking than anything that I have mentioned. I refer to the $500 note that Judge Archbald indorsed for John Henry Jones in December, 1909. It was a three months' note, I believe, although that does not make any difference, and has been renewed continuously from that time down every three or four months. It has been renewed over and over again, and every time Jones signed it, Judge Archbald indorsed it, and Williams indorsed it; the last time Williams indorsed it, being only a day or two before he came down here to testify before the Judiciary Committee. He was asked about that, not by us, but by the managers, whose witness he then was, and he said he indorsed the first $500 note, but he never indorsed one afterwards, whereas he indorsed every one of them, as everybody admits and the bank records show, from the beginning down to the end.

Now, I will ask you to remember another thing about that man. I will speak a little later of how Mr. Boland got him to agree with him to try to get Judge Archbald to do things that Mr. Boland thought might make trouble, but I want to speak of Williams now as a witness. In the first place, he lived in William P. Boland's office. He told us that for a good many long years past, every day, except on Sunday, when the office probably was not open, he spent practically the whole of his time in William P. Boland's office; and after Mr. William P. Boland started the trouble, which has resulted in this trial and in the course of proceedings, Mr. Wrisley Brown, the gentleman who has been doing us the honor to be present during these ceremonies, sitting with the managers and assisting them in the presentation of this case, took the statement in Scranton of Mr. Edward J. Williams, Mr. William P. Boland sat at his side, and from time to time made suggestions or asked questions. Williams says he asked all the questions, but the record shows that he asked very few. Then, Mr. Boland, after he had been down before the Interstate Commerce Commission and an arrangement had been made by a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission for a hearing in this matter before the Attorney General, Mr. Boland sends a telegram to his wife or to some other member of his family a little short of midnight on a certain day, and they rush over to Williams's house, put him in a carriage, take him to the station, rush him down to Washington, and take him to the Attorney General's office, where William P. Boland and Mr. Cockrell, who was there representing the Interstate Commerce Commission, one on one side and one on the other, put words into his mouth and lead him to talk there. Finally he is summoned down before the Judiciary Committee of the House. He appears there as the first witness in the case and sits at the witness table, and William P. Boland has the audacity to separate himself from the audience at that hearing and walk up and sit down at that table beside this old man Williams, so that their elbows touched, and stayed there until Mr. HIGGINS, a member of the Judiciary Committee, perceived what an indecent thing was being done, and suggested that that table was for witnesses and for nobody else.

So it was that this old man, whose understanding of the English language and manner of expressing himself are not of the best, on these three several occasions had been influenced by William P. Boland to make statements, and when he came upon the stand here if in giving his recollection he did not satisfy the honorable managers as to anything he knew or said, there was immediately crammed into his mouth something that had been said by him on one of these former occasions. That is why as to so many of these matters he contradicted himself.

Another thing, Mr. Edward J. Williams was not always a man about whom such remarks might be made as those we have heard here, as one who is not a fit associate for a man of Judge Archbald's standing. He had himself been a man of some substance and influence up there, and had been engaged in a number of important transactions, so that, as he himself said, Mr. William P. Boland had dubbed him "Option" Williams. That is the name he went by to William P. Boland. He was one of the persons who had enabled William P. Boland and Christopher G. Boland to secure that very Marian coal dump, about which we have heard so much, the dump which the Marian Coal Co. was operating near Scranton, and Williams testifies, on page 202 of this testimony, that the Bolands owe him $1,300 and $1,100 out of that transaction. He says, "They told me they were going to pay me as soon as they get their money out of that property. They can not make a dividend until they get it." So that old man, who I need not say is in very hard lines nowadays, with a sum of $2,500 in the hands of the Bolands, which is due to him, an indebtedness which they did not deny in any degree upon this witness stand, finds himself tied between his desire to tell the truth about Judge Archbald and his desire to say what the Bolands had made him testify to heretofore, and what they wanted him to testify again, so that some of these days he might get that $2,500. That is the reason that poor old man upon this stand made such a sorry exhibition of himself. When he was asked why he went to that office so often and what business he had there, he said, on page 202 of this record, "I always went there to get some of the money they owed me."

That brings me to the paper which has figured somewhat in this hearing—the so-called silent party paper. On the 5th of September, 1911, in the office of William P. Boland—present, William P. Boland, his employee, Mr. Pryor, and his stenographer and niece, Miss Mary Boland—this paper was concocted. It was suggested that the word "concocted" was not a proper word to use in addressing the witness on the stand; but it is an eminently appropriate word to use now, and I use it. William P. Boland, who, as he tells you, at that time had made up his mind that he would get Judge Archbald into trouble, had that old man Williams sign that paper. Now, I want to call your attention to the fact that it was about that time that Mr. Boland testified that he would get letters written and get photographs made and have things done with a view of getting Judge Archbald into trouble. The only thing that has ever been said in this record as any excuse for that proceeding on his part was that Judge Archbald had done something wrong in connection with the case of Peale against the Marian Coal Co. All that the judge had even done in that case was to decide against the Marian Coal Co. a demurrer which they filed to the original bill, which raised the simple question whether the suit should be brought there or in another jurisdiction—in the third judicial circuit of the United States—and had made the usual order fixing the time for taking testimony, as to which there never was any complaint. Mr. Boland gets Mr. Williams to sit down and sign this paper, in which it is stated that nobody but Williams and Boland himself and Robertson and Capt. May know anything about the judge's interest in this matter, and assign a two-thirds interest in the contract to Mr. William P. Boland and to Judge Archbald.

Now, Mr. Williams—the only person whose testimony I refer to about it—said this: On two occasions he said that Judge Archbald had nothing to do with that paper—pages 48 and 160. He said that the judge had nothing whatever to do with it, on pages 160, 161, 162, 163, 196, 197, 198, 211, and 212. On two occasions he swore he never told Judge Archbald about it, and he said that the judge never suggested concealing his name and he never had any authority from the judge to sell to Boland.

And Judge Archbald, I need not remind you, has testified that the first he ever heard of that paper was when it came out in the proceedings before the Judiciary Committee; and yet in spite of that testimony, which is all the testimony there is in this case upon the subject of Judge Archbald's knowledge of that paper, one of the learned managers in his argument here said Judge Archbald accepted it. I know not what could have been in the mind of the manager who made that statement, but he certainly owes it to the Senate, before this case closes, to show by the record where there is any testimony to justify that statement, or else to withdraw it.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Taking advantage of the opportunity, I will state to counsel that I never made any such statement. I said that he accepted the interest in this coal dump which this paper offered to convey. I did not say he accepted the paper.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am very much obliged to the manager.

Mr. Manager STERLING. You are entirely welcome.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am very glad the explanation has been made, but I am quite sure that while the manager undoubtedly meant to say what he says he did, he is not so reported in the record. Moreover, the statement, as I am reminded by associate counsel, is just as erroneous as now corrected as it was before in the way in which I understood it.

Where is there any evidence that Judge Archbald accepted anything under this paper? This man Williams pulled out of his pocket here a couple of papers when testifying on his direct examination and said, "I have papers here." The learned managers did not ask him, strangely enough—and it was the first time their curiosity had not been aroused upon the production of a paper by a witness—to explain what those papers were. Now, it happened that I had asked Mr. Williams about this paper in Scranton, when I was there preparing for the trial of this case, and that Mr. Williams had told me he had these papers, and that I had suggested to him to bring them along when he came down here. So he produced them. There were two carbon copies of this silent-party paper made, and that old man has carried them in his pocket from that day to this.

Mr. William P. Boland no doubt had an idea that Williams would get Judge Archbald to sign one of them, and he would have Judge Archbald's name to the paper. But the old man kept these copies in his pocket, and when testifying before the Judiciary Committee testified that he had never received a copy of it, never knew of the paper, and yet he testified here later that, as he told us in Scranton, that when he made that statement he had the two copies in his pocket.

I will proceed with the comforting assurance, to myself at least, until otherwise advised, that no member of this tribunal will consider that paper for any purpose whatever as against Judge Archbald.

Now, there is another thing which is sought to be charged against Judge Archbald, as showing that he acted in a manner indicative of guilt in this case, and that is the recall of the so-called Bradley contract. You will all remember that when that sale to Mr. Bradley was hurried through in April last Capt. May, having had the contract drawn by his counsel, the same Judge Knapp to whom I referred some time ago, sent that form of contract to Bradley with a letter, in which he said that he submitted it and wanted to know whether it would meet the approval of Bradley, taking occasion to send also a copy of the letter to Mr. Williams.

On the next day May met Bradley at the station there—the Laurel line station, I think it is said—and told him he wanted that contract back; that they had concluded there were complications about it which would not justify the company in going on with the sale; and Bradley did give it back to them, and that was the end of it.

Now, it is claimed here—I have not heard anything about it in the argument so far, and I do not know whether my distinguished friend Mr. Manager CLAYTON is going to refer to it or not; but there has been a good deal about this said in the taking of the testimony and in the arguments concerning the admission of the testimony, and therefore I conceive that I must address myself to it for a few moments. Judge Archbald came to the city of Washington, as the records of the hotels show, on the 8th day of April of that year. He was here for two or three days at the Hamilton House, by himself, when Mrs. Archbald came here and joined him, and then they went to the Grafton Hotel, on Connecticut Avenue, and were there until the 20th day of April, as the evidence shows.

It was during this time that this transaction occurred. Capt. May testifies that, after having received that contract from his counsel, and while he had it on his desk, a certain Mr. Holden, whose wife was one of the Everhart heirs and claimed an interest in this Katydid dump, came into the office and talked with him about another matter, another part of the culm transaction which the Everhart heirs had with the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and that he mentioned to Mr. Holden that he had that contract and was about to sell his company's interest in the Katydid dump. Thereupon Mr. Holden at once objected to it and said that he did not want any sale made unless their interests, too, were conveyed. Mr. Holden then went out and got some other parties who were interested as Everhart heirs to write letters to Capt. May objecting to the sale, and himself went to New York, which is only four hours from Scranton, and before taking his train to Boston wrote a similar notice himself, and that that stopped the sale.

Capt. May took these letters to his counsel, and his counsel, as he says, and as Judge Knapp says, advised him not to let the transaction go on.

Senators may wonder what this has to do with this case. Why, it is this: The managers say that at that time there were rumors around Scranton that this investigation was coming on and Capt. May withdrew that contract because he was afraid of the storm that was approaching and of which this is the ultimate result. Capt. May denies it. Judge Knapp, who gave him the advice as to the contract, denies it. Mr. Holden denies that anything of that kind had been heard. The other gentlemen wrote letters at the same time, all denying it; and the evidence is that nothing was known in Scranton about that transaction until the 21st of April, when the Philadelphia North American arrived there with a statement of the charges, and the next day the matter was published in the Scranton papers.

The argument was made, why should Capt. May, of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., stop this supposedly advantageous sale, because of the complaints that were made in these letters, when he was selling only his company's interest in the dump? Why, Capt. May explains that, and his counsel, Judge Knapp, explains it, in a most satisfactory way. It appears that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. was operating to a very large extent coal property there in which the Everharts had a one-half interest, property compared to which this culm dump was a mere flea bite, which they were working for the Everharts, and they were working it under a supposed letter written 25 or 30 years before by a Mr. Darling, who was supposed to have represented the Everhart heirs. Mr. Darling was dead and the letter was lost, and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had not a scrap of writing or any authority whatever to justify them except what had been going on in the past. Judge Knapp said to his client, "If you get into any trouble with these Everhart heirs, they may stop all your proceedings; they may say 'you will have to pay a higher royalty hereafter; we want you to account for what you have done in the past.'"

But whatever may have been the reason that actuated Capt. May in doing that, or have influenced Judge Knapp in advising Capt May to do it, there is no evidence in this case that Judge Archbald had anything to do with it, and he was in fact in the city of Washington when it occurred.

And, further than that, I call the attention of the managers to the fact that the evidence discloses that Judge Archbald never knew about the Bradley sale until it came out before the Judiciary Committee in May. Mr. Williams says he did not tell him about it; Mr. Bradley says he did not tell him about it; Capt. May says he did not tell him about it; and Mr. Robertson says that he did not tell him anything about it; and Judge Archbald says he knew nothing about it. The Bradley sale was one that was concocted in the office of W. P. Boland, who did know this investigation was going on, for the purpose of rushing through a sale of some kind, so that when the matter should come out it would appear that Judge Archbald had realized some benefit from the transaction.

Mr. Williams, when asked if he ever told the judge about it, said "No"; he said, "No; I did not tell the judge about it, but I did not intend to cheat him; I intended to give him his one-half."

Now, coming to this charge in the last article of impeachment, and charged here by the managers over and over again, that Judge Archbald entered into these arrangements with the railroad companies and concealed from everybody except the railroad officials the fact that he was interested, I propose to address myself for a few moments to the evidence on that proposition.

Mr. May says that he did not know what the judge's interest was; Mr. Brownell says he did no know what the judge's interest was, so far as the Katydid matter is concerned; and Mr. Richardson said he did not know.

So, as to these railroad officials who were concerned in this transaction, they knew only that Judge Archbald for some reason was interested in it; whether for himself or others they did not know. I do not mean in the slightest degree to detract from the effect of the evidence as to their knowledge that in some way he was interested. I rest my argument on this proposition, upon the fact that there was no concealment from anybody else.

Mr. Robertson was informed about it. Mr. Robertson came to the judge's office in the spring of 1911, long before he gave his option, and talked it over with the judge, and when the contract was to be drawn by which Mr. Robertson was to give his option, the judge drew it in his own handwriting and himself witnessed Mr. Robertson's signature.

Mr. Pryor knew about it. He witnessed Williams's signature to the silent-party paper and heard the talk about it in Mr. Boland's office. Miss Boland knew about it for the same reason. Mr. Wells knew about it, because he examined the title for Mr. Conn, and his partners, Mr. Torrey and Judge Knapp, of Scranton, knew about it, because they talked about it with the judge when the title was discussed. Mr. Holden and Mr. Heckle knew about it. Mr. Heckle says the judge came to him and tried to get the address of the Everhart heirs.

And, more than all, in the two letters which he wrote to Mr. Conn, proposing that Mr. Conn should buy this dump, he distinctly says that he is negotiating with Mr. Conn for a dump which he and Mr. Williams are purchasing, distinctly stating in both letters that that is the situation of the case, that he is interested in the purchase. Mr. Conn at once employed Mr. Rittenhouse, and told him that Judge Archbald was interested, and afterwards Mr. Rittenhouse went to talk to the judge about it, and finally, in the contract which Judge Archbald drew, by which the sale to Mr. Conn was to be carried into effect, he stated that it was between Robert W. Archbald and E. J. Williams of the one part and this Laurel line on the other part.

I am surprised that the managers should contend with reference to Packer No. 3 that there was any suggestion of concealment, because everything regarding that dump is in writing, everything coming from Judge Archbald is signed by him, and in every letter that was written in regard to it it appears as though the transaction was for him alone, except that when the formal offer of the proposition was made to the Girard estate to lease that packer dump it was signed by Judge Archbald and the three other persons with whom he was associated at that time in the matter—Mr. Bell and Mr. Petersen and Mr. Thomas Howell Jones.

Mr. Warriner testifies that there was never any suggestion of concealment in regard to it. He said that when Judge Archbald came there to talk to him about it, there were many callers there who heard the conversation. Mr. Kirkpatrick, the agent of the Girard Trust, says that when the judge talked with him about it there was no suggestion of concealment. His nephew, Col. Archbald, says the same thing. Mr. Hellbutt, and Mr. Farrell, and Mr. Petersen, and Mr. Bell, and Thomas Howell Jones all say the same thing. There were 15 or 20 witnesses altogether who testified to this. There is nothing in the world to justify the suggestion that it was a secret matter, but everything showing that it was absolutely open and above board.

Again, it is urged that it was an unusual thing to sell these dumps, so unusual that the fact that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. agreed to sell its royalty interest in the Katydid to Judge Archbald, and that the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. was willing that the Girard Trust Co. should let Judge Archbald have Packer No. 3 dump, though paying royalties to both. This the managers claim is evidence of some improper influence used in bringing about the result. I therefore propose to refer to that for just a moment.

There is evidence here of at least 15 different transactions of the same kind. Most of them are in regard to so-called fills of the Pennsylvania Coal Co., which was another of the subsidiary companies of the Erie Railroad Co., of which Capt. May was the general manager. But I am not going to take up the time with them because it appears, in the first place, that this same Hillside Coal & Iron Co. only a short time before had sold its interest in the Florence dump, which was owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and which was in this vicinity—a transaction in which Judge Archbald had not the slightest concern—and sold its interest in that dump for the very reason it was disposing of its interest in the Katydid dump; and that is, that there were these same complications about the title.

And then, as I have already said, there is the fact that this very Katydid dump had been leased; the Katydid coal mine, not the dump only, but the coal mine itself had been leased by this Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to Mr. Robertson, and he had been operating the mine and running the breaker through which the coal from the mine was put, and running a washery which from 1905 to 1908 took the better part of the Katydid culm dump away. So, as to this very dump, the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had disposed of its interest, retaining only a small royalty, long before Judge Archbald had anything to do with the matter.

Now that is all I propose to say directly about this article No. 1 and article No. 3, which refer to the two, and the only two, culm-dump propositions with which Judge Archbald was connected for the purpose of having any possible interest in them himself, and which belonged to any company which could possibly have any business before the Commerce Court.

I propose now to say a few words about article 13. It seems to have been the purpose of the framers of article 13 to try and combine some of the different transactions which are referred to in the other articles. They say that while Judge Archbald was on the bench as district judge, and while on the Commerce Court bench, he devised a scheme of getting litigants in his court to discount notes for him and to go into the buying of culm banks, and get the companies which might have business before him in the Commerce Court to sell him culm dumps at a low valuation. In the first place, I remark about the illogical character of that article, because there is no pretense that while Judge Archbald was district judge he ever had anything to do with culm dumps, and there is no pretense that after he became a judge of the Commerce Court he ever signed or indorsed a note for anybody to discount. There are two notes in question while the respondent was district judge, and these two culm dumps—Katydid and Packer No. 3—while he was circuit judge.

So there is absolutely no connection between the two sets of transactions.

It appears that in none of the transactions which are involved in all these counts did Judge Archbald take the initiative, save alone in No. 4, the one which refers to the Bruce correspondence. And I noticed in reading last night the brief which has been filed here by Mr. Manager DAVIS, that he has the fairness to call attention to the fact that as to certain of these transactions the judge was induced to go into them by somebody else asking him to do it. As to article No. 1, it appears that William P. Boland got Williams to suggest to him going into it. As to article No. 2, Mr. Watson came to him. As to article No. 3, Mr. Jones came to him. As to article No. 5, Mr. Warnke came to him. As to article No. 6, Mr. Dainty came to him. As to article No. 7, Mr. Rissinger approached him; and as to articles Nos. 8 and 9, John Henry Jones approached him. And so as to the trip abroad with Mr. Cannon, which resulted from Mr. Cannon's letter to Mrs. Archbald—the purse transaction, as it has been called—was brought to him by Judge Searle on shipboard. Lastly, in the matter of the appointment of Mr. Woodward, the initiative was taken by the law which required him to make the appointment.

As to one of these cases, I will add a word in addition to what has been said, and so well said, by my associate, Mr. Simpson, and that is as to article No. 2, about the initiative that was taken in that case. It has been said here over and over again that Judge Archbald tried to induce the settlement of the litigation between the Marian Coal Co. and the Lackawanna Railroad Co. for personal profit. It appears that he went into that matter, in the first place, at the suggestion of Mr. Watson, and he has told how Mr. C. G. Boland came to see him. I suggest that in reference to the charges that have been made against Judge Archbald and the innuendoes that have been thrown out about his allowing these different persons upon whom the managers reflect—Mr. Dainty and Mr. Williams or Mr. Warnke—and Mr. Warnke seems to be considered a person who is not a proper one to be associated with; why I know not; and these other gentlemen who came into Judge Archbald's office—it appears here that Judge Archbald's office always had the open door; the door was always open. Anybody who wanted to come into the office and talk to Judge Archbald could come in; he excluded nobody.

It was never shut except once, so far as the evidence in this case discloses, and that was when Christopher G. Boland came into his office and closed the door, and said, "Judge Archbald, my brother William is going crazy. He is so worked up over these troubles of his about the Marian Coal Co. that if a settlement is not reached and these troubles go on, I think my brother is going to lose his mind." And with tears standing in his eyes, with that door closed so that nobody would hear about his brother's mental condition, he said, "Judge, go to those officers of the Lackawanna Railroad Co. and try to get them to bring about a settlement of the dispute to save my brother."

Two or three times he did that, Judge Archbald said, and Mr. Boland did not deny it. After the negotiations had ceased, after that imploration had been made to Judge Archbald, and the papers returned, and after he said that nothing could be done, Mr. Christopher G. Boland goes to Col. Phillips, the officer of the company, and makes a similar statement himself, and tells him that his brother will lose his mind if this matter is not settled, and he says that his brother can not sleep; that he is suffering from insomnia, and says, "I wish you would settle this case."

And there I want to call attention to one thing that is most remarkable in this question in view of the contention that the managers make about the $100,000 proposition. They say that Mr. Watson was to settle that business for $100,000 and to get $5,000 for himself, and if he was demanding $161,000 that was without their authority or knowledge. But when Mr. Christopher Boland went to see Col. Phillips after those negotiations were all over, including all that Judge Archbald had done, he said to him, when he was trying to get him to save the mine of his brother William. "We will settle if you will give us $75,000 and assume the claims of Peale against the company," which claims had then ripened into a judgment. The claims of Peale amounted to $34,000, and the $34,000 added to $75,000 would make $109,000.

Let me also remind the Senators that it has not yet been made criminal, or even a wrong matter, for a judge to engage in business transactions, and that, so far as the neighborhood of Scranton is concerned, if a man is to go into any business whatever it is almost impossible for him to keep from going into a business that relates to coal properties, because that whole country is built up from the coal mines and the operations that grow out of them.

It is not an unusual thing for judges of the Federal court, or judges of any other court, to be engaged in business, to be stockholders, and to be dealing in real estate.

I want also to call attention to a remark made here by one of the managers in the arguments as indicating the character of Judge Archbald and the feeling that people in that part of the country about Scranton and all that part of Pennsylvania have toward him. The managers said that they had to wring their testimony from unwilling witnesses. Well, I think it is true that out of a hundred-odd witnesses who were examined here, nearly all of whom were from that region of the country and nearly all of whom knew Judge Archbald or knew about him, with the exception of the two Bolands they were all his friends.

I ask you to add that to the character of the evidence we have here and which we had to stop producing because there was so much of it and it was taking up the time of the Senate with what was not denied, as showing that if they want to go anywhere to get witnesses who are not friends of Judge Archbald they must go to some place where he is not known.

I wish to add a word to what was said by my associate yesterday in regard to article No. 4, which relates to the Bruce correspondence. I, like him, do not undertake to say that what Judge Archbald did in that case in writing to Bruce and in not sending copies of the correspondence to counsel on the other side was not a mistake on his part, but I do maintain that it is nothing for which he should be adjudged a criminal or for which he should be impeached in this proceeding.

I think every Member of this body will take notice of the fact that here in Washington in the committee inquiries and in inquiries in the Senate and before the various commissions, of which we have so many, the proceedings are not conducted strictly in the manner in which lawyers usually proceed in the ordinary courts of justice, and that the members of those bodies consider that they have the privilege of getting at information in any way that they please when their object is only to get at what are the facts and to do what is right.

In this very case it appears that so notable a body, a body made up of such able and public-minded and fair-minded men as the Interstate Commerce Commission, have done, without it occurring to anybody that they might be criticized, a thing which is infinitely more objectionable than anything that was suggested against Judge Archbald in relation to the Bruce matter. The Marian Coal Co. had filed in the Interstate Commerce Commission this petition, which was referred to in what was known as the rate case, in which it charged not only that the railroad company had charged excessive rates, but that they were trying to ruin the Marian Coal Co. They had deprived them of their water; they had set fire to their dump, burning their own coal so as to burn the coal of the Marian Coal Co. That is the charge made. The record is here. The petition was put in evidence, and when William P. Boland came down to Washington in January of 1912, as he tells you himself, he went to that commission not for the purpose of making any charge against Judge Archbald, but for the purpose of showing to that commission that the railroad company, the opposite party in that litigation, was trying to ruin him; that they had gone to Judge Archbald and Judge Witmer and Mr. Loomis, and Heaven knows to whom, to hurry along the Peale case, which was a suit against the Marian Coal Co., and get a judgment against it and take its property and ruin it so it could not go on with the litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

When Mr. William P. Boland came down to make that statement to Mr. Meyer, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, did he send for the attorneys of the Lackawanna Coal Co.? When he received a letter from Mr. Reynolds about the matter, or the letter from Boland, which is in evidence, written to Mr. Cockrell, saying that he was getting more evidence along the same line which he would send to the commission pretty soon, did they send notice of that correspondence to the Lackawanna Railroad Co.? No; Mr. Meyer said they got Mr. Reynolds, the attorney of the Bolands, and Mr. William P. Boland himself to come to Washington on the day that the Rate case was to be heard before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they said to them outside of the court room, "Do not bring up this matter of Judge Archbald and Judge Witmer and these other complaints in the hearing to-day; keep quiet about that;" and it was kept quiet, but as soon as the hearing was over then, pursuant to an arrangement previously made by Commissioner Meyer, Boland and Williams were taken up to the Attorney General's office.

I do not say that for the purpose of criticizing those gentlemen. They were doing what they thought was perfectly right and proper. They are all honorable men with whom I have the pleasure of being acquainted, and doubtless you know them; but it was a thing done in that way in a case that was pending in that court where the people on one side were heard about the most vital elements in that case without the other party knowing anything about it.

I have here a case which was decided in the Supreme Court of the United States a few days ago which illustrates what I am saying. It is a case of the United States against The Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Co. It is in volume 226 of the Supreme Court Reports, and I read from page 20 of this pamphlet. It is a case which had come up to that court from the Interstate Commerce Commission:

It is unnecessary to consider objections to the conclusion of the commission that it was safe and reasonably practicable, etc., to establish the switch. We remark that it is stated in the commission's report that they base their conclusion more largely upon their own investigation than upon the testimony of the witnesses. It would be a very strong proposition to say that the parties were bound in the higher courts by a finding based on specific investigations made in the case without notice to them.

So, there the Interstate Commerce Commission, in pursuance of the public and important duties devolved upon it, which it has exercised so honestly and so greatly to the public benefit, conceived that it had the right to make an investigation and reach a conclusion upon information obtained by an investigation which the parties knew nothing about and had no opportunity to meet. Yet I suppose it never occurred to anybody that the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be impeached, much less be held to have done something of which they ought to be ashamed when they did that. It was a mistake, but a mistake only, and in that way the Supreme Court treated it.

But, Senators, there has something occurred in this Chamber in the trial of this case which is more important than that, and which illustrates what I am saying. You will find in the record of this case, on page 809, that growing out of a suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] there was a discussion or colloquy here as to why the briefs had not been filed which the Senator understood the Senate had directed should be filed. Counsel had not so understood it and the briefs had not been filed. Mr. Manager CLAYTON thereupon said, "I have handed copies of our brief to some of the Senators." We were not informed of that fact. This tribunal before which I am speaking is a court. It is to decide upon questions as a court decides upon them, and the question involved is one of as great interest to my client as anything that will ever happen to him in this world can possibly be.

The managers are the counsel on the other side, and they had handed to our judges in this proceeding copies of their brief. What the brief was I knew not. I do not know to this day. I make no complaint about it. It was perfectly proper to hand it to the judges if they chose to do so. It is a perfectly proper thing for the judges to receive it; but I should like to know how the manager can stand here and ask you to impeach Judge Archbald for having done in the case of the Louisville & Nashville rate case what he has himself done in this very case.

In regard to the note which is referred to in articles 8 and 9, I call attention to a slip of the tongue which my brother Simpson made. It may have attracted the attention of some Members of the Senate when he said in reference to that $500 note that the judge testified that Jones told him either that the note had been or would be presented to the Bolands and they had refused to discount it. What the judge testified to, and what he says in his answer, is that Jones at some time told him that the note had been or would be presented to the Bolands, and nothing more. His testimony is that he never afterwards heard what was done, and the Bolands say that they never communicated with him on the subject. Williams says the same thing, and Jones says the same thing.

Now, as we are reaching the closing hours of this case, Senators, I want to devote a few words to the history of it. When a discussion arose in the course of the trial about the charge which we are making against the Bolands, as the managers put it, the managers said they wanted the Senate to know something about the history of this case, and they put in a little of that history. I propose to call attention to what is before you in regard to that matter to show how it was that the feeling which at one time existed against Judge Archbald in reference to this matter was aroused, improperly, I will not say, but aroused by the belief of the public that things existed which were absolutely without any foundation whatever.

The managers say that in the opening statement counsel for Judge Archbald charge that this was a conspiracy on the part of the Bolands, and that we are trying to defend Judge Archbald on that ground. If the managers will read the opening statement they will find that there is nothing in it to justify that averment. What I said then was that these proceedings began by charges that were made by William P. Boland, and that they arose out of his disordered mind and had no real existence. I know that it takes two to make a conspiracy, and the managers, of course, know that, too; and they know that the charge could not be properly construed into a charge of conspiracy between William P. Boland and anybody else. I make no charge of anything wrong against William P. Boland. I look upon it now as I looked upon it then, as the act of a man whose brain is in such a condition that he is to be pitied, not to be blamed, and I think that what took place in this case justifies me in making that statement.

Now, mark the connection of Boland with this case. He had got into his mind, without, as it appears here, the slightest foundation of any kind, that Judge Archbald, while on the district court hearing the Peale case, had done something against him. When you look at what he has testified to here, he says the judge sent the case to New York. Of course, that is simply an hallucination. There were some depositions, it appears, taken in New York by counsel on both sides by agreement; but he got it into his head that the judge in some way had transferred that case to New York. That is the thing which he says made him undertake to see what he could do in getting the judge into trouble. He found the Katydid dump, and he told Williams about it, and then said to Williams, "You go to Judge Archbald and get him to give you a letter to Capt. May." Then, after he had gotten the letter to Capt. May and the sale was not made, he said, "You go to Judge Archbald and get him to go to the New York office of the Erie." When the option was made out, which Judge Archbald prepared in his own handwriting, with Robertson, by which Robertson agreed to sell his interest for $3,500, Judge Archbald drew that, as I said, and witnessed it; and gave it to Williams to keep. Williams showed it to Boland, and Boland did the extraordinary thing of getting the grantee to acknowledge it. Then he took it over to the recording office and recorded it, and paid for recording it. Then he took a photograph of this silent party paper which he himself had concocted in his office, and got any letters Williams had and had them photographed; and then he came down to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I invite the attention of the Senate to what took place when he came here and how this prosecution began. It is on page 762 of the record in this case. I ask Senators to remember that this paper was offered in evidence by the managers for the purpose of letting the Senate know that it was not true, as we charged, that this proceeding was begun by anything that William P. Boland did.

Now, see this extraordinary document, a document that a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission took to the President of the United States as representing the result of an investigation that had been made in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He says, in the first place, that a demurrer had been filed in the Peale case; that thereafter the $500 note that is referred to in the evidence was presented to the Bolands for discount; that they refused to discount it, and that thereupon Judge Archbald overruled the demurrer.

It is established here, so that nobody disputes it, that the demurrer had been overruled three months before the note had any existence, and that the statement was the creation merely of the disordered brain of William P. Boland. He himself said on the stand, "I have always believed that note was before the demurrer was overruled." Everybody agrees it was not so. The bank officers were brought here, and you have the record of the bank where it was first discounted, and are told the date when it was discounted, which was in December, 1909. The note was dated in December and the demurrer was overruled in the previous September. Then, listen to this. The judge is represented in this Cockrell statement by "A."

"A." went to New York and saw Mr. Brownell, vice president of the Erie road, who telephoned Mr. May, superintendent of the Hillside company, to give Williams an option on the culm bank.

Now, think of that. That was the statement that originated in the same disordered brain.

"A." returned to Scranton and made out in his own handwriting and signed as witness an option giving Williams the right to purchase the culm bank for the sum of $3,500.

Can you imagine anything more grotesque, more absolutely untrue and ridiculous than that statement? The judge went to Brownell; Brownell went to the telephone and telephoned to May to sell that property for $3,500. The judge takes a train and comes back to Scranton and goes over to see May and writes out the option for him to sign; the whole statement is without the slightest excuse, except that the man who made it was a crazy man.

I will not go into all the details of it. There are other things almost equally as bad. Finally he says:

Boland says the litigation referred to by Seager is the suit filed by Peale and that Seager has inside advance information of the decision of the court, which has not yet been handed down.

The court had decided the case. Judge Witmer had decided it in the previous August. He had decided that Peale was in the right in the case and had given a perpetual injunction against the Marian Coal Co. in favor of Peale, and the question whether the amount which was to be paid in the way of damages should be $18,000 or more was the only thing that was left open,

The excuse is made for that proceeding by Mr. Meyer that it was prepared by Mr. Cockrell, and that if Judge Witmer's name was left out of it or there was anything else wrong about the statement it was Mr. Cockrell's mistake. We brought Mr. Cockrell here to see why it was that he had prepared a letter to be taken to the President making charges against a Federal judge, whose name until that time was untarnished, by such an extraordinary document as that. He said that Boland was there in the morning and made a statement to him. He did not make any notes of it, but in the afternoon he jotted down, according to his recollection, what had been said. That statement is taken to the President of the United States—that misstatement, I should say. The President directs an inquiry to be made. The Attorney General has the matter in charge. He sends Mr. Wrisley Brown up to Scranton to make an investigation. He makes his ex parte investigation, Judge Archbald knowing nothing about it, and it being intentionally kept from him for the reason, no doubt, that Mr. Wrisley Brown did not want to have this matter get out and injure the judge's reputation if there was nothing in the charges.

It comes back to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General in a formal paper, when the papers in this case were sent to the Judiciary Committee of the House, said:

> I had proceeded so far in this investigation that I intended to notify Judge Archbald and ask him to explain, but the resolution passed the House calling for the papers, and therefore the investigation proceeded no further.

So the matter went to the House.

Now then, in the course of this proceeding, in the early days of August last, by Mr. Manager CLAYTON, when we were considering whether we should be forced into a trial of this case at that time, and again during the argument of the case by Mr. Manager WEBB, day before yesterday, you have been impressed with the fact that the judgment of the House of Representatives in this case in favor of impeachment was practically unanimous, the only vote against it being that of Mr. FARR, who comes from the Scranton district and who, like so many of the witnesses here, knew Judge Archbald personally.

I never heard it suggested, and I do not believe that Mr. Manager CLAYTON, when he was district attorney in the district down in Alabama, ever heard it was a proper thing in trying a case before a jury to try to urge the jury to convict by telling them that the grand jury were unanimous in reaching a conclusion in the case.

I think it was a great mistake on the part of Mr. Manager CLAYTON and on the part of Mr. Manager WEBB to try to affect your action here by telling you that in the hearing which was had before the House of Representatives the conclusion that was reached was unanimous.

I desire to call your attention to a few things that the managers here said to the House of Representatives, by which they obtained that unanimous verdict. Mr. Manager CLAYTON, on pages 40 and 41 and 113 of the first volume of the proceedings in this case, said to the House that the proceedings were ex parte.

On page 65, Manager STERLING told them the same thing. On page 67, Mr. Manager WEBB said the same thing.

I especially call attention to what appears on pages 100 and 111 of this record. On page 100, Hon. Mr. HOWLAND, now Mr. Manager HOWLAND, said:

> The proceedings thus far have been ex parte, and every friend of Judge Archbald on this floor owes it to him at this stage of this proceeding to vote in favor of this resolution to-day, in order that he may have a full and free opportunity before the bar of the Senate to prove, if he can—and I trust in good faith and in all sincerity that he can—that he is absolutely innocent of the prima facie case which is made in this resolution.

On page 111, I read from what was said not by one of the members of the committee but by Mr. AINEY:

> In voting to-day I do so upon the ground frequently expressed here in debate, that this vote is not upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, but I cast it in the sympathetic hope and belief that in the tribunal provided by the Constitution, under the fullest investigation which will there be had, his name will be cleared and his fame shine forth as brightly and as unsullied as in the days of yore.

So that some of the managers on the part of this impeachment appealed to the House that every man there who was a friend of Judge Archbald's should vote for the resolution sending the case here, not because it was found that Judge Archbald was guilty of anything or that it was the expression of the opinion of the Members of the House of his guilt or innocence, but to give him an opportunity for a hearing where the question of his guilt or innocence might be determined.

But more, Mr. Manager STERLING said to the House that Mr. Williams saw the brief in the Lighterage case on the judge's desk on the 31st day of March. So testified Mr. Williams in this case. Mr. Williams said that he took that letter to Mr. May on the 31st day of March, the day it is dated, and he went back to Judge Archbald's office on that day or the next day, and then it was that he saw these papers, whatever they were, relating to the Lighterage case, and had a conversation with Judge Archbald about that case. The Lighterage case did not get into the Commerce Court until the middle of the following month of April. By no possibility could there have been a brief, list of cases, or anything else relating to that case on Judge Archbald's desk on the 31st day of March or anywhere near that time.

Let me, while I am speaking about that lighterage matter, also remind the Senate that some time in August, 1911, Mr. William P. Boland conceived the idea that he would have everything that E. J. Williams said preserved. So he directed his stenographer, Mary Boland, every time Williams came there, to take down in shorthand or make a record of everything he said. She was here with those notes under our subpœna, which show that on the 18th day of September Williams said he had been at Judge Archbald's office and had seen on the judge's desk a brief in the Lighterage case, and on the 28th day of September those notes show that Williams came in in the morning and said he was going over to see the judge about that case, and later in the day he came back and said he had talked with the judge about it. And the undisputed evidence discloses that the trial list or docket of the Commerce Court containing the word "lighterage" in connection with that case was sent to Judge Archbald on or about the middle of September.

Now, that was after the judge had been to Mr. Brownell, and it was long after Capt. May had written the letter in which he said he would recommend the sale of the Katydid dump for the sum of $4,500 to his company.

It is impossible, in the first place, that Judge Archbald could have said anything to Mr. Williams about this case at the time Williams said he did, and it is impossible, if the conversation took place at the time the notes of Mary Boland indicate it did, that it could have had any effect upon the action of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.

In this connection I wish to refer to the fact that it appears that Mr. William P. Boland got Williams to go into the room which is next to Judge Archbald's office, the room through which you go to get into his office, occupied usually by his clerk or a subordinate of some kind, and to stand at that window and show him the lighterage paper, whatever it was. That is Boland's story.

I suggest to the Senate whether that does not indicate that this whole lighterage business is one of those things which was concocted by the unbalanced mind of William P. Boland, and that as a matter of fact Williams never had any conversation with the judge about it at any time or any place. If he ever did have any such conversation, it occurred long after the option, or what they call the option, had been given to Mr. May, and it occurred after the Lighterage case had been decided by Judge Archbald and the other members of the Commerce Court, and while the case had gone up to the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal from their judgment.

But more extraordinary still, Senators, is the statement which was made to the House by Mr. Manager STERLING and which has heretofore been referred to in the taking of testimony in this case, on page 59. You will bear in mind that Judge Archbald never knew anything about the Bradley transaction. He was in Washington when it occurred; Capt. May was the person who sent the contract to Bradley and recalled it at the station. This is what Mr. Manager STERLING recollected of that transaction when he was informing the House what was the evidence against Judge Archbald:

> That—
> Referring to the contract—
> was sent to Bradley on one day, and the next day Archbald sees Bradley at the depot and asks him to call that off, that some complications have arisen, and they had better stop the negotiations, and also writes him a letter to the same effect, in which he tells him the transaction will be withdrawn on account of certain complications. No one knows what complications were referred to, excepting there had appeared in the newspapers in the meantime this scandal about Judge Archbald's relations with persons who had litigation in his court.

The most extraordinary travesty on evidence that I ever heard stated in any court anywhere. Instead of stating that Judge Archbald never had anything whatever to do with the Bradley transaction and that Capt. May had recalled the contract because of the contention growing out of letters written to him by adverse claimants and on the advice of his counsel had withdrawn it, to tell the House that Judge Archbald was making the sale to Bradley, and that after the thing had been published in the newspapers, which was not until 10 days after the contract was withdrawn, the judge went and recalled it, thereby practically telling the House that Judge Archbald had confessed his guilt.

There are other things in the same line that I thought of referring to, but I shall not take up your time in that way. Those are sufficient. But I ask the Senate to consider how much weight should be given to the fact that the President of the United States thought worth while to have this matter investigated, when his action was brought about by presenting to him a paper obtained in the way that this Cockrell statement was prepared, containing a tissue of misstatements so erroneous that they were absurd; when that paper was made upon the statements of a man who was clearly out of his mind, and made without any investigation to determine whether he was telling the truth; when the Judiciary Committee took that inquiry out of the hands of the executive department of the Government just at the time when Judge Archbald was to have an opportunity to defend himself and to show what the real facts were? I ask what weight shall be given to the fact that practically all the Members of the other House voted in favor of these impeachment articles, when that vote was obtained upon the erroneous statements which the managers so innocently made to the House, bearing so terribly against Judge Archbald and so entirely inconsistent with the real facts? Further, what consideration should be given to that vote when it was obtained upon the statement made to the House by three members of the Judiciary Committee, who are here to-day as managers, that it was not to be considered as a vote upon the guilt or the innocence of Judge Archbald, but that every friend of his in that House should vote for it so as to send the case to the Senate, where he should be given, what he had never before had, an opportunity to show what the facts were?

It is not until now, when the last of his counsel to speak is closing the argument for the respondent, that the Senators who are doing me the honor to listen to me know what the facts in this case are, because it is simply impossible for anybody, except those who have been familiar with the case heretofore, who have gone over the case with the witnesses before they came on the stand, and who have examined and classified the evidence and arranged it as we have had to do for your information, to know what the facts are. I ask you now, after the evidence is all in, to see how pitifully poor are the real facts against Judge Archbald in this case, and whether you will consider that you will throw aside the language of the Constitution, which says that in order to convict you must find that he has committed a crime or something that is punishable, and that you will say that upon those transactions which are so trivial and which any man in his condition, however honest and upright, might have innocently done—I ask whether you will say that you will find him guilty and deprive him of his office? I take my seat with the conviction that you never will do it. I can say no more.

ARGUMENT OF MR. CLAYTON, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate that the unusual and painful duty which has been devolved upon this body will soon be fully discharged, and I felicitate the managers and the counsel for the respondent as well as the respondent himself that our labors in regard to this case are about at an end.

Mr. President, before I shall discuss the propositions involved in this case, either of law or fact, I desire to call the attention of the Senate away from that case which the distinguished counsel for the respondent has tried to make before the Senate. If a stranger had appeared in this Chamber so long consecrated to public service by the acts of the great men who have filled it from time to time as the representatives of the States of the federated Union, that stranger might have imagined that the managers of the House of Representatives were themselves being lectured for misconduct rather than that a judge was on trial for misbehavior. I need not say that there was no impropriety in the managers handing to Senators at their request the brief embodied in the report which was made by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives to the House of Representatives, carrying the identical views expressed here and which have been but little added to by the brief which has been formally presented on behalf of the managers to the Senate.

The gentlemen who represent the respondent are oblivious of the fact that it is highly proper for any Member of the House, or even any humble official of that body who has charge of the matter, to hand to any of you or to anybody else a public document. I need not dwell further upon that. The Senate will readily draw the distinction between that act and the secret procurement by a judge of a brief from a railroad attorney to be used in a case pending then before his court, delivered to him at the instance of the judge through the medium of private correspondence, never permitted to be seen or examined by anyone else.

Mr. President, the managers were also lectured by the counsel who first addressed you for the respondent. He animadverted on the manners of the managers of the House. Everything that the managers have done in this case, from its very inception, has a precedent for it. The language used by Mr. Manager WEBB, which the counsel but a short time ago criticized, was in substance used by former managers in this august tribunal. I only refer to this for the purpose of showing to the Senate what I now assert, that the effort has been on the part of the respondent and his honorable counsel from the very beginning to mystify this case, to obfuscate the questions of law and fact, if, indeed, there be necessary facts which are not admitted by the respondent in his answer and on the stand.

Mr. President, we are not trying the managers of the House of Representatives; we are not trying Christy Boland, whom the judge addressed as "Dear Christy"; we are not trying William P. Boland; we are trying a high judicial officer for a breach of a high public trust. This trustee, clothed with authority, with power, with a discretion in the administration of justice that no legislative body can have, has been unfaithful to this position of trust; he has not had due regard for the high nature of the place of power and confidence, fraught with good or ill as he might discharge his public duty. We have come here, Mr. President, to try this judge for his misbehavior while clothed with this high and responsible privilege—for it is a privilege conferred upon him by the political power of the Government; and, more than that, it was his duty to be the unswerving and irreproachable minister of public justice.

Oh, all this effort to divert the attention of the Senate from the real case on trial is the trick of the criminal lawyer! And let me call attention to the senseless refinements and useless technicalities so frequently interposed by the counsel for the respondent—the gratuitous interjections of remarks in this case by the counsel—and the general conduct of the excellent gentlemen who have represented this respondent, to show that they are adepts in the art of defending common criminals, and that every trick and every device short of positive offense has been employed by these honorable gentlemen. I do not complain, for I wanted the respondent to have the benefit of all that the ingenuity of the legal profession could afford him. Certainly, Mr. President, he has been ably defended.

Permit me to further call the attention of the Senate to the design of the counsel by their ingenuity to direct your attention away from the case that you have before you. They have undertaken to confuse in the minds of the Senate personal rights which belong to the defendant under the Constitution—under the Bill of Rights—with a political privilege which is not covered by the Bill of Rights. The right of free speech, the right of trial by jury, the right of freedom of conscience are protected by the Bill of Rights, and it is not within the power of this great body to take from the humblest citizen of the land any of those rights. We are not trying that sort of a case. The expert criminal lawyer always likes to try some imaginary case; but, in the language of the frontier, this tribunal will bring these gentlemen back to the lick log and will try this case which the Senate has under consideration.

I have said that this judge holds a position by virtue of political privilege—a privilege, and not a right. It is the enjoyment of a trusteeship, of a privilege, coupled with which privilege is a solemn duty. That is what is involved in the case we have before the Senate.

Mr. President, much confusion has been attempted to be created by the counsel for the respondent in their effort to show that this is a court in the ordinary acceptation of that term. Whatever name you may call this body sitting here now, whatever functions they may discharge, it can not be said to be a court as that word is employed in the Constitution or understood by the ordinary man. It is more than a court. Under our Government it is clothed with the highest and most extraordinary powers of any body or any functionary or any agency of our Federal Government. Your powers here invoked are political in their nature. Mr. Bayard announced that doctrine in the first impeachment case—that of Blount. Every commentator, including Story and all the rest, have quoted it with approval, and should any man deny it he would at once confess himself ignorant of the history and the law of impeachments. Why is it political? Read the Constitution, and you find in Article III that:

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

I desire here, for the purpose of completing the argument or suggesting a way that it may be completed, for in view of the limited time at my disposal I shall take the license that poets indulge in of making the suggestion of the idea to the mind of the Senate and with confidence leave it to your learning and intelligence to develop the argument.

Said Mr. Sumner:

By the National Constitution it is expressly provided that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," thus positively excluding the Senate from any exercise of "the judicial power." And yet this same Constitution provides that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." In the face of these plain texts it is impossible not to conclude that in trying impeachments Senators exercise a function which is not regarded by the National Constitution as "judicial," or, in other words, as subject to the ordinary conditions of judicial power. Call it senatorial or political, it is a power by itself and subject to its own conditions. (The Works of Charles Sumner, Vol. XII, E. 415, 6 S., 93, p. 321.)

Again, Mr. Sumner said:

Discerning the true character of impeachment under the National Constitution, we are constrained to confess that it is a political proceeding before a political body with political purposes; that it is founded on political offenses, proper for the consideration of a political body, and subject to a political judgment only. Even in cases of treason and bribery the judgment is political and nothing more. If I were to sum up in one word the object of impeachment under the National Constitution, meaning what it has especially in view, with its practical limitation, I should say expulsion from office.

Further, Mr. Sumner said:

There is another provision of the National Constitution which testifies still further and, if possible, more completely. It is the limitation of the judgment in cases of impeachment, making it political and nothing else. It is not punishment, but protection, to the Republic. It is confined to removal from office and disqualification; but, as if aware that this was no punishment, the National Constitution further provides that this judgment shall be no impediment to trial, judgment, and punishment, "according to law." Thus again is the distinction declared between an impeachment and a proceeding "according to law." The former, which is political, belongs to the Senate, which is a political body; the latter, which is judicial, belongs to the courts, which are judicial bodies. The Senate removes from office; the courts punish. I am not alone in drawing this distinction. It is well known to all who have studied the subject. Early in our history it was put forth by the distinguished Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, the father of Senators, in the case of Blount; and it is adopted by no less an authority than our highest commentator, Judge Story, who was as much disposed as anybody to amplify the judicial power. In speaking of this text he says that impeachment "is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors; it touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity."

Samuel J. Tilden, in his Public Writings and Speeches, volume 1, page 474, said:

Impeachment, as it exists in the United States under the Federal Constitution and the State constitution, is a procedure for the removal from office of a public officer if cause therefor is found to exist. Its object is not to punish the individual but to protect the people. Even a disqualification afterward to hold office, if it be superadded to the removal, is more preventive than penal.

So we form a correct conception of what this tribunal is, its purposes, and its powers. Again, if it be necessary, let me ask from what power did this judge derive that trust which he has violated? Did he derive it from the judicial power? No. It was derived from the exercise of a political power. The President, exercising political power, nominated him for this office and the Senate of the United States, with its power of disapproval, with its vitalizing power of confirmation, before he could become a public officer, exercised not a legislative function, not a judicial function, but brought into operation a power which, in its very nature and in any just conception you can take of it, was a political power.

Now, Mr. President, I say this because I want to get away from the murky and unhealthful atmosphere of a police court, and I want to try on a higher plane this great cause involving the rights—the civil rights—the power, and the majesty of the American people on the one side and on the other the puny privilege of an unfaithful judge to desecrate his official position. It is political. Why? Because under representative institutions that is the only way under our Constitution that the political power exercised in the creation of a Federal judge can be performed. Under the State constitutions, or most of them, that political power is exercised by the people in their primary capacity when they select by ballot their judges to preside over them and administer public justice.

So we come at once to a correct conception of the purpose of impeachment, a correct conception of the law of impeachment. My associates have given you the authorities upon this proposition. They can not be answered. Oh, the effort is made here, as has been made in all other cases and will likely continue to be made in the future until—and God forbid—and I say it reverently—that that time shall come—the remedy of impeachment shall be decided by this august tribunal and the American people to be futile. Senators, will you tell the American people that this remedy is futile? If you do, they will find an effective remedy to drive from place and power the unworthy judge.

Referring to the function of impeachments, Rawle, in his work on the Constitution (p. 211), says:

The delegation of important trusts affecting the higher interests of society is always, from various causes, liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign States, or the baser appetite for illegitimate emoluments are sometimes productive of what are not unaptly termed "political offenses" (Federalist, No. 65), which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding.

The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law.

Mr. President, every court in this land is clothed with that indefinable power—judicial discretion; more extraordinary, more far-reaching, more hurtful in case of abuse than any power which is vested by the Constitution in the Senate as a legislative body or as an organization for the trial of an impeachment case. And yet judicial discretion must exist, and yet the power of removal must exist. "Nature abhors a vacuum." This great Government of ours can not be paraded before the people as being powerless to remove a puplic official from office. There is no such vacuum in the power of government. There can be no such hiatus in the power of a successive government.

I shall quote from one of the earliest writers, one of the most frequently quoted, and so far as my reading has allowed me to know, this authority has never been quoted except with approval. I refer to Wooddeson's Lectures.

It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs, may abuse their delegated powers to the injury or ruin of the community and at the same time in offenses not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents, and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice; and they can not consistently, either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue to any other court but that of those who share with them in the legislature.

On this policy is founded the origin of impeachment, which began soon after the Constitution assumed its present form * * *. (P. 501.) Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the Commonwealth by the abuse of high officers of trust, are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery, or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office, if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws, or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So, where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to betray his trust, a privy counselor to propound or support pernicious and dishonorable measures or a confidential advisor of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments, these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments, because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses, or to investigate and reform the general polity of the state. (Wooddeson's Lectures on Laws of England, 3 volumes in 1, p. 499.)

I shall also quote, now, from the Fifteenth American Law Register, pages 646–647, where Judge William Lawrence said:

Whatever "crimes and misdemeanors" were the subjects of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are therefore subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution.

The framers of our Constitution, looking to the impeachment trials of England and to the writers on parliamentary and common law and to the constitutions and usages of our own States, saw that no act of Parliament or of any State legislature ever undertook to define an impeachable crime. They saw that the whole system of crimes, as defined in acts of Parliament and as recognized at common law, was prescribed for and adapted to the ordinary courts.

They saw that the high court of impeachment took jurisdiction of cases where no indictable crime had been committed, in many instances, and there were then as there yet are, "two parallel modes of reaching" some, but not all, offenders; one by impeachment, the other by indictment.

In such cases a party first indicted may be impeached afterwards, and the latter trial may proceed notwithstanding the indictment. On the other hand, the King's bench held in Fitzharris's case that an impeachment was no answer to an indictment in that court.

The two systems are in no way connected, though each may adopt principles applicable to the other and each may shine by the other's borrowed light.

With these landmarks to guide them, our fathers adopted a Constitution under which official malfeasance and nonfeasance, and, in some cases, misfeasance, may be the subject of impeachment, although not made criminal by act of Congress or so recognized by the common law of England or of any State of the Union. They adopted impeachment as a means of removing men from office whose misconduct imperils the public safety and renders them unfit to occupy official position.

Mr. President, I shall also read from Pomeroy on the Constitution, pages 608–609:

We must adopt the second and more enlarged theory, because it is in strict harmony with the general design of the organic law, and because it alone will effectively protect the rights and liberties of the people against the unlawful encroachments of power. Narrow the scope of impeachment, and the restraint over the acts of rulers is lessened. If any fact respecting the Constitution is incontrovertible, it is that the convention which framed, and the people who adopted it, while providing a government sufficiently stable and strong, intended to deprive all officers, from the highest to the lowest, of any opportunity to violate their public duties, to enlarge their authority, and thus to encroach gradually or suddenly upon the liberties of the citizen. To this end elections were made as frequent, and the terms of office as short, as was deemed compatible with an uniform course of administration. But lest these political contrivances should not be sufficient, the impeachment clauses were added as a sanction bearing upon official rights and duties alone, by which officers might be completely confined within the scope of the functions committed to them. We can not argue from the British constitution to our own, because the English impeachment is not, nor was it intended to be, such a sanction. But the English law recognizes a compulsive measure far more terrible, because far more liable to abuse than impeachment. What the British Commons and Lords may not do by impeachment, the Parliament may accomplish by a bill of attainder. If the Commons can only present, and the Lords can only try, articles which charge an indictable offense, there is no such restriction upon their resort to a bill of attainder, or of pains and penalties. The Constitution has very properly prohibited this species of legislation; but the constitutional impeachment was intended to partially supply its place under another and better form by introducing the orderly methods of judicial trial, and by requiring a majority of two-thirds of the Senate to convict.

The same considerations will apply with equal force to that branch of the argument which is based upon the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors." Even had the words been "felonies and misdemeanors," we should not be obliged to take them in a strict technical sense; they would be susceptible of a more general meaning descriptive of classes of wrongful acts, of violations of official duty, punishable through the means of impeachment. But in fact the language used can not be reconciled with the assumed technical interpretation. The phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" seems to have been left purposely vague; the words point out the general character of the acts as unlawful; the context and the whole design of the impeachment clauses show that these acts were to be official, and the unlawfulness was to consist in a violation of public duty, which might or might not have been made an ordinary indictable offense.

Mr. President, we come now to the expression employed in the Constitution—"treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors." "Treason" needs no definition; "bribery" needs no definition; but you can nowhere find the meaning of the term "high crimes" or the term "misdemeanors," as they are there used, except by a resort to the English parliamentary law and to the American precedents which have followed that law.

But the counsel say you must go to the English common law, thereby meaning the English municipal law, which has been defined to be a rule or rules "commanding that which is right and forbidding that which is wrong." No, no, Mr. President. No commentator has said that. No adjudicated case has held that. The correct doctrine is that for the true interpretation of those words you go to the body that invented and employed them. Where else would you go? There is the fountain source. I go to the ordinary courts of law for the common law of Great Britain.

The common law; what is it? The decisions, opinions, judgments, and precedents of common-law tribunals. What law court in this country or in Great Britain, sitting as a law court, building up and adding to and interpreting municipal law, ever dealt with the question of what constituted high crimes and misdemeanors or what constituted an impeachable offense? To interpret and expound that law has never been a function of any court. Impeachment has been always, when employed by our British ancestors down to this good hour, a proceeding apart from that of the ordinary courts that are constituted and organized to sit and hear causes that are justiciable. I think I need not dwell further upon that.

Mr. President, as to the definition of impeachable offenses, as Rawle said, it is difficult to define what they are. The fact is that many provisions of the Constitution are incapable of an advanced, comprehensive, or satisfactory definition to meet every case that may possibly arise. The mistake that these gentlemen representing the respondent make is that they confuse the question of jurisdiction with the question of definition. It is familiar to every Senator, whether he be a lawyer or layman, that the Constitution is an instrument of enumeration and not of definitions. So, when you come to the clause that gives you jurisdiction of this case, the impeachment case, you know from the history of the formation of our Government that such provision was inserted in order to clothe somebody under the Federal Government with the jurisdiction to remove civil officers. The fathers thought it not wise to give it to the President, for the King had it and had abused it. They thought it not wise to turn it over to the House of Representatives or the House and the Senate jointly. They looked with confidence to the far future, when possibly the country might be imperiled on account of the faithlessness of public officials, and they said the Senate, the representatives of the States, the States each choosing the Senators through the medium of their legislature or, as I hope it will be soon, through the medium exercised directly by the people, that this body, the Senate, could be intrusted with this power. Why? Because, in addition to what I have said, it was less likely to be abused here than elsewhere. Possibly a President might want to coerce the judiciary; possibly the House of Representatives might be inflamed in times of excitement; but this body, composed of men of long tenure, of trained minds, of experience in public affairs, could be intrusted with this extraordinary jurisdiction and power.

I will not undertake to frame a complete definition of all the causes to which impeachment applies. The Constitution has abstained from attempting such a definition. The causes for which a civil officer of the United States may be removed from office by impeachment were purposely made indefinite by the framers of the Constitution, just as under the Articles of War the causes for which an officer of the Army or Navy may be summarily removed from office by sentence of court-martial were purposely made indefinite.

An impeachable high crime or misdemeanor may be said to be a political offense by a civil officer of the United States which is prejudicial to the public interest. It may consist in any official misconduct or misbehavior, not necessarily committed under color of office, which in its natural consequences tends to destroy the confidence of the public in the official integrity or bring into disrepute the personal character of the offender.

I may be permitted to read from Guthrie's fourteenth amendment:

Such a constitution is an enumeration of general principles and powers or of limitations upon the exercise of governmental functions, and it is not a mere code of rules to regulate particular cases. All progress and improvement would be barred and a constitution would soon become useless if it were not construed as a declaration of general principles to be applied and adapted as new conditions presented themselves. * * * As Chief Justice Marshall said in the famous case of McCulloch v. Maryland: "A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves." And ex-President Harrison has well said in his interesting book on This Country of Ours: "To the lay mind it may seem puzzling and not a little discouraging that a century has not sufficed to interpret the Constitution; but the explanation is largely in the fact that constitutional provisions are general and not particular, and the court is required constantly to apply them to particulars and to new conditions."

Nor should the courts attempt to define with precision the scope of a constitutional provision, although this is constantly and necessarily done in construing statutes. A definition of the scope of a constitutional provision can not be necessary in any case. An exposition of the general meaning of the principle is all that should be attempted. The sole inquiry must be whether the particular case submitted for adjudication is or is not within the principle of the constitutional provision invoked or to be implied therefrom, for what is implied is as much a part of the instrument as what is expressed. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly declared that it was wiser to ascertain the scope and application of the fourteenth amendment by the "gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded."

And, Mr. President, may I say that the Supreme Court has never undertaken to define the meaning of "the equal protection of the laws"? The Supreme Court has never undertaken to give a comprehensive definition of "due process of law." It has pursued the process of construing that law in the light of the case that it has before it. And by no other process of reasoning, nor in any other way, can the fourteenth amendment, particularly these two provisions that I have mentioned, be defined or construed. Will any man here tell me that he can write the meaning of "due process of law" or of "the equal protection of the laws" applicable to every case? Let me invite you to look at the cases wherein the meaning of these terms has been under consideration and construed. And, Mr. President, from time to time new cases demand the further application and definition of these provisions. But I have not the time to dwell further upon that subject.

Now I come to another proposition. It is elementary to say that in construing an instrument, I care not whether it be a statute or whether it be a constitution—or I believe I may add that I care not whether it be a contract: You must look at the whole instrument, be it constitution or be it an act of a legislature, be it a contract or other written instrument.

That is laid down in Southerland, in Sedgwick, and stated by all the writers, and I shall quote from them, Mr. President, not for the purpose of enlightening this learned body upon so elementary a proposition, but merely for the sake of completing the harmony of my argument:

It is to be presumed that all the subsidiary provisions of an act harmonize with each other, and with the purpose of the law; if the act is intended to embrace several objects, that they do not conflict. Therefore it is an elementary rule of construction that all the parts of an act relating to the same subject should be considered together and not each by itself. By such a reading and consideration of a statute its object or general intent is sought for, and the consistent auxiliary effect of each individual part. Flexible language, which may be used in a restricted or extensive sense, will be construed to make it consistent with the purpose of the act and the intended modes of its operation, as indicated by such general intent, survey, and comparison—ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio. (Southerland on Statutory Construction, pp. 284, 285.)

239. The intention is to be ascertained by considering the entire statute. The practical inquiry is usually what a particular provision, clause, or word means. To answer it one must proceed as he would with any other composition—construe it with reference to the leading idea or purpose of the whole instrument. The whole and every part must be considered. The general intent should be kept in view in determining the scope and meaning of any part. This survey and comparison are necessary to ascertain the purpose of the act and to make all the parts harmonious. They are to be brought into accord if practicable, and thus, if possible, give a sensible and intelligible effect to each in furtherance of the general design. A statute should be so construed as a whole and its several parts as most reasonably to accomplish the legislative purpose. If practicable, effect must be given to all the language employed, and inconsistent expressions are to be harmonized to reach the real intent of the legislature. It is said to be the most natural exposition of a statute to construe one part by another, for that expresses the meaning of the makers; this expression is ex verceribus actus. The words and meaning of one part may lend to and furnish an explanation of the sense of another. "To discover," says Pollock, C. B., "the true construction of any particular clause of a statute the first thing to be attended to, no doubt, is the actual language of the clause itself, as introduced by the preamble; second, the words or expressions which obviously are by design omitted; third, the connection of the clause with other clauses in the same statute, and the conclusions which, on comparison with other clauses, may reasonably and obviously be drawn. * * * If the comparison of one clause with the rest of the statutes makes a certain proposition clear and undoubted, the act must be construed accordingly, and ought to be so construed as to make it a consistent whole. If, after all, it turns out that that can not be done, the construction that produces the greatest harmony and the least inconsistency is that which ought to prevail."

240. General intent of statute key to meaning of the parts.—The presumption is that the lawmaker has a definite purpose in every enactment and has adapted and formulated the subsidiary provisions in harmony with that purpose; that these are needful to accomplish it, and that, if they have the intended effect, they will at least conduce to effectuate it. That purpose is an implied limitation on the sense of general terms, and a touchstone for the expansion of narrower terms. This intention affords a key to the sense and scope of minor provisions. From this assumption proceeds the general rule that the cardinal purpose or intent of the whole act shall control, and that all the parts be interpreted as subsidiary and harmonious. They are to be brought into harmony, if possible, and so construed that no clause, sentence, or word shall be void, superfluous, or insignificant. But where a word in a statute would make the clause in which it occurs unintelligible, the word may be eliminated and the clause read without it. It would be mischievous to attempt to wrest such words from their proper and legal meaning merely because they are superfluous.

241. The intention of the whole act will control interpretation of the parts.—Words and clauses in different parts of a statute must be read in a sense which harmonizes with the subject matter and general purpose of the statute. No clearer statement has been, or can be, made of the law as to the dominating influence of the intention of a statute in the construction of all its parts than that which is found in Kent's Commentaries: "In the exposition of a statute the intention of the lawmaker will prevail over the literal sense of the terms; and its reason and intention will prevail over the strict letter. When the words are not explicit the intention is to be collected from the context, from the occasion and necessity of the law, from the mischief felt, and the remedy in view, and the intention is to be taken or presumed according to what is consonant with reason and good discretion." If upon examination the general meaning and object of the statute be found inconsistent with the literal import of any particular clause or section, such clause or section must, if possible, be construed according to that purpose. But to warrant the change of the sense, according to the natural reading, to accommodate it to the broader or narrower import of the act, the intention of the legislature must be clear and manifest. The application of particular provisions is not to be extended beyond the general scope of a statute unless such extension is manifestly designed. Legislatures like courts must be considered as using expressions concerning the thing they have in hand; and it would not be a fair method of interpretation to apply their words to subjects not within their consideration, and which, if thought of, would have been more particularly and carefully disposed of. The mere literal construction ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the legislature apparent from the statute; and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention can be better effected the law requires that construction to be adopted. The intention of an act involves a consideration of its subject matter and the change in, or an addition to, the law which it proposes; hence the supreme importance of the rule that a statute should be construed with reference to its general purpose and aim. "Where the words," says Lush, J., "employed by the legislature do not directly apply to the particular case, we must consider the object of the act." (Southerland on Statutory Construction, pp. 317–321).

Every part of a statute must be viewed in connection with the whole, so as to make all its parts harmonize, if practicable, and give a sensible and intelligent effect to each. It is not presumed that the legislature intended any part of a statute to be without meaning. (Southerland on Statutory Construction, p. 412.)

Now, we have heard discussed the jurisdictional power of this body, the power to impeach. Mark you, Mr. President, the impeaching clause confers jurisdiction and power upon you. It contains the limitation that this power is confined to civil officers. The Constitution of the United States is an instrument of delegated powers, and I take it that even without the tenth amendment power not delegated to the Federal Government would not, under the theory of the federal scheme that the States entered into, have been conferred upon the Federal Government. This power here invoked was given to you—this jurisdiction, this process, if you please. Why is the process necessary? You can speak of removal from public office, or, in the language of the respondent's ingenious counsel, you can speak of the "recall." We have under the Constitution power of removal vested somewhere and applicable to the case of every official or functionary of the Federal Government.

The President is automatically "recalled," if you please, automatically removed every four years. You, Senators, are automatically "recalled" every six years. A Representative has to face a "recall" or a removal every two years. Every civil officer is removable by a time limit or is removable at the pleasure of the appointing power except one, and that one is the Federal judge, who can be removed by the judgment of the Senate only.

Oh, it is monstrous, say the counsel, to contemplate taking from his high position of violated trust this judge. Let us see the conditions upon which he acquired that trust. Here I invoke the doctrine that this provision of the Constitution must be construed in pari materia with the jurisdictional provision which has been so often referred to. Says the Constitution: "Judges * * * shall hold their offices during good behavior."

Mr. President, that was the contract. That is a corollary to the appointing power. That was the limitation. That was the protection promised to the people against abuse. Yet this cardinal canon of construction to which I have referred is to be ignored and the tenure conditioned upon good behavior is to be read out of the Constitution. Watson and Tucker and all of the other authorities say if you construe it as the counsel in this case construe it you render it a nullity.

Did our fathers write meaningless phrases into the organic law of our country? Did they not have a purpose—a well-considered purpose—when they put those words into that instrument? You can not get away from the proposition that in the case of a judge his tenure is limited to during good behavior. It carries with it the undoubted meaning and force that if he misbehaves himself he shall not longer hold that office.

In his work on the Constitution, Foster says (p. 586):

The Constitution provides that—

"The judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behavior."

This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law.

The Constitution provides that the judges shall hold their position during good behavior, and as an unavoidable corollary to this provision it must follow that misbehavior on the part of the judge will, when the jurisdiction and power of this tribunal is invoked, remove him on account of the forfeiture of title to his judicial office.

This provision in the Constitution is an admonition against misbehavior by a judge. Thus, when a judge commits acts constituting misbehavior within the meaning of this provision, he violates the positive law of the land. A statute of Congress has no force or effect unless it is passed in pursuance of the legislative powers granted to Congress by the Constitution. Therefore, if Congress should pass a statute making misbehavior or misconduct on the part of a Federal judge an indictable offense, the question which would confront the Senate would be precisely the same as the question which is presented in the case now before you for your determination.

Senators, your powers are derived from the Constitution just as the powers of the Supreme Court are derived from that instrument. It is not competent, it is not within the power of Congress by any enactment, to add to the jurisdiction or powers of this body or of the Supreme Court.

It may be that if an act of Congress should denounce certain things as constituting high crimes and misdemeanors the Senate would take it as a legislative interpretation of the Constitution. You might follow it and agree to it. But if you saw fit to say that the offenses denounced by such act of Congress do not constitute high crimes and misdemeanors as contemplated by the Constitution, what power can gainsay your rightful authority to so determine?

In the old case of Marbury v. Madison the Supreme Court held that you can not add to the jurisdiction of that tribunal, because it was of a constitutional derivation. The same power that denies the enlargement denies the subtraction.

Now, Mr. President, it is not necessary that the offense be committed under the color of office. Suppose a judge were to commit highway robbery and be put in the penitentiary, would you hold that he could not be impeached upon the ground that it was not done in his judicial capacity? Would you say that he could go on and hold that office and administer justice in behalf of the people of the Federal Union from the walls of the penitentiary of some State? It is an absurdity.

I read from Black on the Constitution:

Treason and bribery are well-defined crime. But the phrase, "other high crimes and misdemeanors," is so very indefinite that practically it is not susceptible of exact definition or limitation, but the power of impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or the laws which, in the judgment of the House, is deserving of punishment by this means or is of such a character as to render the party accused unfit to hold and exercise his office. It is, of course, primarily directed against official misconduct. Any gross malversation in office, whether or not it is a punishable offense at law, may be made the ground of an impeachment. But the power of impeachment is not restricted to political crimes alone. The Constitution provides that the party convicted upon impeachment shall still remain liable to trial and punishment according to law. From this it is to be inferred that the commission of any crime which is of a grave nature, though it may have nothing to do with the person's official position, except that it shows a character or motives inconsistent with the due administration of his office, would render him liable to impeachment. It will be perceived that the power to determine what crimes are impeachable rests very much with Congress. For the House, before preferring articles of impeachment, will decide whether the acts or conduct complained of constitute a "high crime or misdemeanor." And the Senate, in trying the case, will also have to consider the same question. If in the judgment of the Senate the offense charged is not impeachable, they will acquit; otherwise, upon sufficient proof and the concurrence of the necessary majority, they will convict. And in either case there is no other power which can review or reverse their decision. (2d ed., pp. 121–122.)

I now read from Mr. Tilden's Public Writings and Speeches:

Misconduct, wholly outside of the functions of an office, may be of such a nature as to exercise a reflected influence upon those functions and to disqualify and incapacitate an officer from usefully performing those functions. This is especially and peculiarly true of the judicial office. In such cases the misconduct constitutes an impeachable offense and is ground for removal. The words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are not limited to official acts. (P. 481.)

Now, the question of misbehavior, I take it, has been fully dealt with by my associates in their discussion of the case.

Mr. President, we come now to consider one thing in this case, to use the language of the street, that "bobs up serenely" in every criminal case. Every old criminal lawyer on earth raises it in every case, and in this high tribunal, when this man's acts are revealed to you in their nakedness, in their probative force, from which you can draw your own inference or conclusion, the "fog machine" is put to work on intent. But sensible men, as you, Senators, are, need not the voluntary aid of this accused man to tell you his intent. It was significant in the trial that one of the counsel read from an authority the concluding sentence of which was that such evidence given by a defendant is of little value. Indeed, it is of little value in this case.

Mr. President, there never was a criminal on earth who would not disclaim a bad intent; and yet shall they go unwhipped of justice? It is a peculiar characteristic of persons afflicted with paranoia that they think they are right.

I shall not be personal here, but a judge stands before you who is forced under cross-examination to admit that he engaged in a practice so reprehensible that no honorable judge was ever accused of the like before—brazenly admitted that he had done it, that he had sought the money, that he wanted it, and said on the witness stand here "what of it?"

Mr. President and Senators, that is one thing the matter today with the Federal judiciary, some of them. I am glad to say that I think, in point of integrity and fairness and ability, the Federal judiciary averages in every respect as high as the judiciary of any State. I pause long enough to pay that great branch of our Government this tribute, that nearly all of them are honest, highminded, faithful ministers of public justice.

I read from One hundred and sixty-fifth United States, page 53, the case of Agnew v. United States. It was claimed in this case that the trial court erred in giving the following instructions:

The law presumes that every man intends the legitimate consequence of his own acts. Wrongful acts knowingly or intentionally committed can neither be justified or excused on the ground of innocent intent. The color of the act determines the complexion of the intent. The intent to injure or defraud is presumed when the unlawful act, which results in loss or injury, is proved to have been knowingly committed.

But Chief Justice Fuller said:

In our opinion there was evidence tending to establish a state of case justifying the giving of this instruction, which was unexceptionable as matter of law.

Now, I come to discuss briefly the question of character. It is not pleasant to me to have to animadvert upon the conduct of one of my brethren who belongs to the opposition in this discussion. He made much ado about nothing. Senators, shall I say that he took an unimportant matter and distorted it into something that it did not mean for the purpose of beguiling you into a belief that is not founded upon fact for the purpose, as a part of an argument, to mislead? I shall not say to deceive, for that is a harsh word. He adverted to the proceedings when Mr. Manager CLAYTON (who is now addressing you), in order to expedite this trial, said repeatedly it is not necessary to have a multitude of witnesses here to establish a good character or a good reputation in Scranton on the part of this man. We do not put that reputation in issue. We will offer no witnesses.

The Senate will recall that the manager said that this right to examine character witnesses had a limitation in every court in every State in the Union, either limited by the discretion of the judge, or limited by the rule of the court, or limited by statute, and I said that in the State of Illinois by a rule of the supreme court that had the force and effect of statute, it was limited to eight; and yet, forsooth, when I was trying to aid this body to bring this cause to a conclusion, on that little circumstance he builds up his assertion not warranted, saying, "Oh, this man's character, his integrity is unassailed and unassailable." Oh, puny argument! Oh, despicable suggestion! Oh, how inexecrable. Oh, oh, miserable pettifogging!

Mr. President, the character of this man or his reputation at Scranton is not what we are trying. We are trying him for misbehavior. Honorable counsel for the respondent referred to a case in Holy Writ, where Christ shielded the woman from being stoned. I do not know what application he meant to make of that; but I suppose that he meant to say that Christ forgave the sinning woman who had not a good reputation, and therefore by what he believes to be ineluctable logic you should forgive this sinful judge. Atoning grace is never extended except following contrite confession.

Mr. President, I may be pardoned for referring to another case in the Scriptures often referred to. The betrayer of our Savior, who gave that betraying kiss for the 30 pieces of silver, had a good reputation, and could have proved it by all the other Apostles and by the people who saw that body going about doing good; and yet, Mr. President, and still yet, he was guilty of betraying his Lord and Master, just as this man, clothed on account of his high reputation with power and responsibility, has prostituted that power and responsibility for the greed of gain!

Again, let me quote from the Book that the counsel for the respondent who first spoke seems to think a good authority here:

He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house, but he that hateth gifts shall live.

And again:

Thou shalt take no gift, for the gift blindeth the wise and perverteth the words of the righteous.

That is what it would do to him. The reward that was to come to his henchmen is also dealt with, I think, in this same Book. They were to get money; these railroad officials were to have the favor of the judge; they were to be welcomed among the high and the mighty who sat in the judgment seat in the Commerce Court. "A man's gift maketh room for him and bringeth him before great men," namely, the judges of the Commerce Court of the United States.

Mr. President, the necessary effect of this judge's conduct, regardless of his intent, was repeated misbehaviors. It in nowise subtracts from the sum of his wrong conduct if his standard was as low as it seems to have been. We are not to judge him by that degraded view, but we are to pronounce judgment according to the better rule of the results, the consequences, and the effect of his conduct.

Mr. President, counsel has said that the judge did not write a letter to Brownell on Commerce Court paper.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I said he did.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Then I misunderstood you.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. One of the managers said he did not, and I was correcting him and said that he did.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Very well. The counsel for the respondent, after contemptuous reference, waived aside as of no importance the fact that the judge used the official letterheads of the Commerce Court in his correspondence with the officials of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. Of course, the mere value of the paper falls under the doctrine of de minimis, but this correspondence on these official letterheads is a pertinent and important fact. In effect the counsel has said that it is common for public officials to use official paper in their correspondence. Of course, Mr. President, "there would be no impropriety in writing a note to a lady on such stationery," as counsel has said, but let me state an extreme case: It would be highly improper for any public official to write a note on such paper to a bawd for the purpose of making a liaison. The evil in this case consisted in the persistent use of the letterheads of the court in correspondence with perfectly reputable gentlemen representing corporations having litigation or likely to have litigation in his court. There should not be a suggestion made by a judge in his business dealings that he has power or authority over those from whom he seeks to obtain a contract of benefit to himself. And this is true whether or not such conduct influenced reputable gentlemen. The judge sought to do so.

The same counsel has said that the judge made no effort to conceal his identity or his connection with these culm dumps. He drew two of the options for the purchase of culm dumps or coal properties, and in neither one of those options in which he was to share, according to the testimony, is his name disclosed as a party in interest, and in all, or nearly all—I am sure that is accurate—he did disclose his name when he wanted that disclosure to have effect upon the railroads or upon their officials.

Oh, it is said that the judge has not been guilty of bribery or a statutable offense. Possibly not. Bribery, like highway robbery, is a brutal and vulgar offense. It is not an artistic performance. Of course, when he was going to the railroad officials, either in Pennsylvania or in New York, when he made his repeated visits to the various cities of Pennsylvania—several of them—and to New York, he did not send those people word, "I must have money; I must be allowed to make an advantageous trade; and you must afford to me that privilege."

Oh, no, Mr. President; he did not say that. That would have been rough and brutal, and would have probably subjected him to an indictment under the bribery statute. He was too learned for that, too polished, too suave, too artful. If he had gone into the offices of one of those officials and said, "I demand, by virtue of my power and influence as a judge of a court which will deal with your corporation, that you give me a profitable trade," he doubtless would have been ordered out. He might have been thought insane. But he did not adopt that method. He wrote some 25 or 30 letters to those officials—and they are here in evidence—and in these 25 or 30 letters, in nearly every instance, he used the official paper with the heading of the Commerce Court printed on it. "Oh, but," he said on the stand, "I just dictated those letters, and it was a matter of indifference to me; I never thought about it; my stenographer selected the paper." But this letter to Brownell, as well as other letters in evidence, were not dictated to stenographers; they are in his own handwriting and were written under the same letterheads.

His method was this: To send a sweet note making an engagement, soft in its terms, free from the positive assertion that "I want money" or "I want to force you to give me an advantageous trade." No; those letters amounted to a messenger in each case saying to those officials in honeyed accents, "The judge says you ought to be good enough to accord him the opportunity to make some money out of trading with your company"; and he follows his messenger into the offices of those people in Pennsylvania and in New York. Instead of a verbal demand we can imagine we hear him say softly, "Good morning, my dear sir," and we imagine that they might have replied, "Good morning, Judge; you are a judge of the Commerce Court. We have cases before you." And the judge might have answered, "Yes; you have cases before me for adjudication, but we will not talk about that. What I have come for is for you to give me an advantageous trade. You denied the opportunity to Williams; you denied those trades to all the others of the common herd in Scranton—give them to me." Why? He was judge, and he sought in this way to commercialize his potentiality as a judge. I do not say, Mr. President, that such a conversation occurred, but the judge put himself in the compromising position which may suggest the possibility of the thought.

Is that bad behavior in office? For that or other conduct like it in one isolated case you might give him the benefit of the doubt, but there are five coal transactions in the record. That is the system to which Mr. Manager STERLING referred. Five transactions in regard to coal dumps or fills for which he sought to acquire contracts that he might make money out of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. That is the system. One incident follows right along after the other, and now I will state a significant fact, Senators, or several significant facts. I want to call your attention to them. These facts are pregnant, persuasive, and conclusive that the judge misbehaved himself:

First. Judge Archbald undertook to acquire the five coal properties or to deal with the five coal properties after he became judge of the Commerce Court, and not before. The railroads were engaged in interstate commerce. He held the rights of those railroads in one side of the scale and the rights of the shippers in the other. He had potentiality; and after he acquired that potentiality he became afflicted with the itching palm—"the love of money, the root of all evil," according to the Blessed Book. This overshadowed and swept away all desire to preserve unsullied his judicial integrity and name. Then his official salary of $9,000 per annum was regarded by him as insufficient for his comfortable maintenance.

Second. Judge Archbald had never attempted to acquire coal property before he became a judge of the Commerce Court.

Third. In no case did any of the deals involve the expenditure of so much as a cent of money by the judge.

Fourth. His sole contribution in each case was his personal service. There were lawyers and lawyers in Scranton; there were business men there who could draw an option; they had but to copy them. There were lawyers and lawyers there who could have advised them. What was his service? Influence as a judge? With whom? With the people engaged in interstate commerce who controlled these coal properties. Answer that pregnant fact, if you can.

Fifth. In each case his services were first invited by some third person, some "go-between," who requested him to take up the matter with the railroad or some of its subordinate officials or some of its ancillary corporations. Oh, the door of his office was open, says the counsel. Yes; so open, so notoriously so that the John Henry Joneses, the Thomas Starr Joneses, the E. J. Williamses, and men of like standing and irresponsibility had a welcome access to it. And Watson had his willing ear. So anxious was he to help Watson to settle a case which was likely to come before his court that he telegraphed him and went to meet him down at the Raleigh Hotel on a cold day. Take all that. He was easy, because they knew his desire to make gainful bargains with litigants or probable litigants before his court.

Mr. President, I shall here state the facts regarding the Lighterage case, which has been prominently mentioned in testimony throughout this case. This case was a proceeding originally brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and other railroads, including the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, the Erie, and the Lehigh Valley, for the purpose of securing relief from discriminatory lighterage charges in New York Harbor. It will be remembered by the Senators that Judge Archbald negotiated with the officers of the Erie Railroad for the purchase of the Katydid culm dump, as charged in article No. 1; that he negotiated with the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad for settlement of a case brought by the Marian Coal Co. against that railroad before the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that Judge Archbald negotiated with the Lehigh Valley Railroad for the purpose of securing an operating lease on the culm dump known as Packer No. 3, charged in article 3. The Interstate Commerce Commission granted an order in favor of the complainant on December 5, 1910. The railroads took the case to the Commerce Court, by petition filed on April 12, 1911 (Commerce Court docket No. 38), and a preliminary injunction, temporarily suspending the operation of the order of the commission, was granted by the court on May 22, 1911, without an opinion. In June, 1911, the United States, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. noted an appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court passed on the action of the Commerce Court in granting this preliminary injunction, on June 10, 1912. The Supreme Court ruled that the Commerce Court had power to issue the temporary injunction and remanded the case to that court for adjudication on the merits. The minutes of the proceedings of the Commerce Court on October 2, 1911, which appear in the testimony of Mr. A. F. Gallagher, page 333 of the record, shows conclusively that Judge Archbald considered that this case was pending in the Commerce Court for adjudication on the merits at that time. From this stenographic report it appears that the counsel for the United States objected to the taking of the testimony in that case until the Supreme Court should pass upon the appeal from the temporary injunction. But in answer to this objection Judge Archbald asked from the bench the following significant question: "If they want to hear all of the case, how can you deny it?" This shows conclusively that Judge Archbald regarded this case as still before his court on the merits.

These statements also apply to the so-called restricted fuel rate case (Commerce Court docket No. 39), to which these railroads were parties in interest.

Now, I want to come to a more particular discussion of some of the other articles. Of course, I regret that I have not the time to take up these articles seriatim and discuss them at length, but even in that situation I count myself happy, because my associates have demonstrated, I think, that we have sustained these articles, and I think that their arguments have not been answered. Furthermore, I am happy in the belief that the Senate has or will read the excellent presentation of this case as made by my associates.

Necessarily, I will have to deal with only a few of the suggestions made in the argument by the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. Worthington says the letter by May to Williams saying he would recommend the sale of the Katydid was all that ever happened. As a fact, it was merely the beginning. The railroad did not follow May's recommendation until Archbald had gone to New York and had seen Brownell and Richardson. Counsel for the respondent can not get away from the ugly fact that Vice President Richardson, of the Erie Railroad, was opposed to the sale of this Katydid dump until Judge Archbald came to see himself and Brownell.

After this visit Mr. Richardson changed his decision regarding the matter, and directed May to grant the option. The testimony of both May and Richardson shows this conclusively. Capt. May did not fix any price on the dump until after Archbald's visit to Richardson.

Counsel for the respondent said that the Katydid culm dump was a worthless dump. Mr. President, let us see. The testimony of Mr. Rittenhouse, the civil engineer, is here. It shows that it was a most valuable culm dump. That examination and that report were made by him without knowing for what particular purpose they were made and without knowing that he would ever be called here as a witness. It is a true and impartial report, as I believe, and when I say I believe, I recur to a criticism that the counsel for the respondent made upon one of the managers. The House of Representatives is here now before you, theoretically, telling you what the House believes. In the ancient days the House actually attended these sessions. Now the managers come here as the House. And would it not be strange that the House could not tell this body that it believes in what that House did under sanctity of oath when they voted the articles of impeachment?

A worthless culm dump! It was valuable. But, Mr. President, I am not going to discuss that. Let us see. Judge Archbald then finds himself in the attitude of acquiring without paying one cent a worthless coal dump! Then he attempted to sell it for a large profit!

The last time the amount asked by him was $25,000. Subtract from that about $8,000, the amount that he was to pay, and the balance represented is profit. I think, Mr. President, it would be a better defense if they were to admit that it was valuable rather than to say it was worthless and that this high-minded judge was trying to put off worthless property upon people for a large sum of money.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Would you mind telling the Senate to whom he sold it for $25,000?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I say he made the contract—the option. I refer to the letter of September 20, 1911:

> MY DEAR MR. CONN: This will introduce Mr. Edward Williams, who is interested with me in the culm dump about which I spoke to you the other day. We have options on it both from the Hillside Coal Co. and from Mr. Robertson, representing Robertson & Law, these options covering the whole interest in the dump.

This letter shows that he considered that he was getting a clear title to this dump through the options from May and Robertson.

There were several of these options where the property was to be sold one time to this concern; another time, I believe, to Thomas Star Jones's concern. These options were drawn by Judge Archbald, and he omitted his name from each of them.

Mr. President, I pass now to another error committed by the counsel. The Hillside Coal & Iron Co. refused to buy Mr. Robertson's interest in the Katydid culm dump because they denied that Robertson had any interest in it by reason of his abandonment of the operation for a period of over three years. The Du Pont Powder Co. gave up the idea of buying the Katydid dump because they decided to buy their power from a power company. The transaction occurred a number of years ago when the culm was not nearly so valuable as it is to-day.

Again, Mr. Manager STERLING simply moved to strike out the testimony of one of the witnesses for the respondent. That is my answer to what he said about Judge STERLING's effort to exclude the Rittenhouse report. On the contrary, Mr. President, you will bear in mind that we had his report, and when his report was omitted from the printed record by the reporter the manager who is now addressing you came before the Senate the next day, or as soon as he could, and had it printed as a part of the proceedings.

This illustrates many of the errors, inaccuracies, and unintentional, I think, misstatements indulged in by counsel.

The lease to Robertson was a colliery operating lease on a royalty basis made many years ago—a very different proposition from an outright sale of a culm dump.

Respondent's counsel stated that the plat made by Merriman, on which May made his estimate when he fixed the price at $4,500, showed 55,000 gross tons of material of all kinds. This is so utterly unwarranted that I feel that I should not let it go unchallenged. May testified that he figured on a basis of 80,000 tons of gross material (see record, p. 987); but to show how entirely worthless is all of counsel's argument as to the value of the Katydid, he insists that the map made by Merriman showed 55,000 gross tons of material. The map plainly shows 55,000 gross tons of coal. Here is the map. It speaks for itself. Look at the footnote made by the engineer. The map appears on page 987 of these proceedings. I hope every Senator will turn to it and interpret it for himself. At the bottom of the map is this notation:

> Estimate 55,000 gross tons (available), exclusive of slush, rock, dirt, etc., of no value.
> As per Mr. Johnson, inspector.

That is a map that counsel said showed only 55,000 gross tons of material. It shows by its footnote that this engineer reported 55,000 tons of coal and not of slush, rock, and the like, and coal combined.

Mr. President, the counsel animadverted upon the witness Williams. They may say what they please about him—Edward J. Williams—he was the associate, the business partner, the intimate friend of Judge Archbald, made Judge Archbald's office his headquarters, where he spent much of his time. Counsel further say that May always wanted to sell the Katydid culm dump. Mr. Williams reported to the judge that May treated him gruffly; that he could not trade with him. He had to get the judge, referring to the statement of Mr. Manager STERLING, which is correct, to "intercede" with Mr. May, and to intercede with the higher railroad officials, in order to have May to make that trade. And Judge Archbald did intercede with them, as the testimony abundantly shows.

But something was said in argument to the effect that the judge did not say he was to have a half interest. Why, Mr. President, the judge admitted all along through this testimony that he was to have a part of the profit out of these properties. I can not stop now to cite the testimony, but the Senate will bear it in mind that he admitted it, and in one instance he said, "Why not?"—admitted it and said "Why not?"

Another significant fact is that he did not become very busy to help Williams acquire a culm dump until Williams had made it certain that he was to have an interest in it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to revert further to this article 1. If the Senate will take article 1 and put in one column the charge in that article and put into a parallel column the admissions of the defendant, you will find that every charge embraced in that article is admitted except on the question of intent. He denies that he undertook to influence the officers of said company except as he has admitted that in the agreement to sell the Katydid culm dump. He denied that he willfully or unlawfully or corruptly or otherwise took any advantage of his official position as judge to effect that contract. But he does admit all the other allegations; that he responded to the suggestion of Williams, and solicited by conference and letter May, the manager of the Hillside Co., to put a price on the Katydid. He admits that, failing to get the price from May, respondent in August, 1911, while in New York, applied to George F. Brownell, general counsel of the Erie Railroad Co., for information concerning the proposed sale. He admits that Brownell informed respondent that Richardson was the proper officer of the company to approach in the matter, and introduced the respondent to Richardson, and respondent said to Richardson he was there simply for the purpose of getting an early answer, one way or another, to the request for the sale of the Katydid. He admits that Richardson informed the respondent that he would communicate with May; and on August 29, 1911, when respondent casually met May in the streets of Scranton, he was informed by him that the Hillside Coal Co. had decided to sell its interest, and was requested by May to tell Williams to call on May. He admits that respondent notified Williams of this conversation, and that on the next day May advised Williams that the Hillside Coal Co. would sell the dump for $4,500. He admits that during the whole period of these negotiations and transactions the respondent was a judge as charged in the article; that the Erie Railroad Co. was a party litigant in the suits mentioned in the article; and that divers proceedings were pending in the Commerce Court, and divers actions taken by that court in those cases.

I have mentioned his denial of the charges which goes simply to the question of intent. We submit the substantial facts, the substantial admissions, and ask the Senate to judge of him rather than by his denial and by his disclaimer of wrongful intent made here upon the witness stand.

Oh, but they undertake to try the Bolands and to say that the judge was trapped in this matter. Mr. President, that is a sickly defense. The idea of a judge of a great court of the United States being innocently trapped into this sort of a transaction by Boland and by Williams—by Boland, whose mentality the counsel reflects upon, and by Williams, for whose lack of mental acumen he apologizes.

I read, Mr. President, from the case of Grimm v. The United States (156 U. S., 610), where Mr. Justice Brewer said:

It does not appear that it was the purpose of the post-office inspector to induce or solicit the commission of a crime, but it was to ascertain whether the defendant was engaged in an unlawful business. The mere facts that the letters were written under an assumed name and that he was a Government official—a detective he may be called—do not of themselves constitute a defense to the crime actually committed. The official, suspecting that the defendant was engaged in a business offensive to good morals, sought information directly from him, and the defendant, responding thereto, violated a law of the United States by using the mails to convey such information, and he can not plead in defense that he would not have violated the law if inquiry had not been made of him by such Government official. The authorities in support of this proposition are many and well considered.

May I inquire, Mr. President, how many minutes I have remaining?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that half an hour of time is remaining to the manager.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Now, Mr. President, I shall not have time to further answer the ingenious devices and suggestions resorted to by the counsel for the respondent concerning article No. 1. I shall therefore refer you to what my associate managers have said in the preceding arguments, and I do it with confidence, for their reasoning was illuminating and their logic was irresistible.

Now I revert to the second count, the Marian Coal Co. I desire to answer certain arguments and statements made by counsel for the respondent in regard to article 2, which is commonly referred to as the Marian Coal Co.'s case.

Mr. Simpson said in his zeal on behalf of his client on yesterday that Christy Boland, one of the witnesses introduced on behalf of the managers, had testified to an untruth in giving his testimony before Mr. Wrisley Brown. Mr. President, there is no evidence to sustain such a statement, and I am sorry that the counsel who made that criticism used harsh and unparliamentary language in denouncing Mr. Christy Boland, who was Judge Archbald's "Dear Christy."

But it must be excused somewhat upon the fact, I suppose, that our friend Simpson is of a highly nervous organization, and sometimes that nature forces an unparliamentary explosion.

Mr. Brown met Mr. C. G. Boland, sometimes called "Christy," and had a conversation with him, in which he asked Boland certain questions, and to which Boland made reply. Brown's stenographer was present and took notes of what was said. When the statement of the conversation was written out it was submitted to C. G. Boland and he was asked to sign it and swear to it. This he positively refused to do. It is in the printed copy of the stenographer's transcribed notes in which the matter referred to is found, and is as follows:

Mr. BROWN. Did Watson give you any intimation of what was to become of this large excess over the $100,000?
C. G. BOLAND. No.
Mr. BROWN. You did not concern yourself about it?
C. G. BOLAND. No.

Mr. Boland finally agreed to give Brown a statement, which he prepared himself, and in that statement he cut out all reference to the questions and answers referred to which appear in the stenographer's notes. Mr. Boland's full explanation of this whole matter appears on pages 723 and 724 of the hearings before the Senate.

Counsel for respondent on yesterday, if I understood him correctly, admitted that if Judge Archbald used his influence to aid Mr. Watson in securing a $5,000 fee, and did it corruptly, he would be guilty of the charge made against him in this article, although he might not himself share in the fee. I think the learned counsel has done himself credit to make such admission, for I hardly think that a position to the contrary could be successfully maintained before this high Court of Impeachment.

What are the facts? Edward J. Williams, an associate of the judge in the Katydid transaction, went to C. G. Boland and told Mr. Boland that he believed that George M. Watson, an attorney of Scranton, was in position to settle the controversy of the Marian Coal Co. with the Lackawanna Railroad Co. Mr. Boland called upon Mr. Watson and they finally reached an agreement whereby Mr. Watson was employed to make an effort to effect the settlement. It was agreed that the Bolands would sell their two-thirds of the stock of the Marian Coal Co. for a lump sum of $100,000, and that if Mr. Watson could secure a settlement upon that basis he would be paid a fee of $5,000.

According to the testimony of C. G. Boland, a day or two after that agreement was entered into with Watson, he was called over the telephone to come to Judge Archbald's office. In response to the telephone call, he went to Judge Archbald's office and found Judge Archbald and Mr. Watson there. He states that Judge Archbald stated over to him that he understood that they were to sell their entire interest in the property for $100,000 and had agreed to pay Watson a $5,000 fee if he could bring about a settlement on that basis. He further testifies that in the same conversation, that Mr. Watson told him in Judge Archbald's presence that the judge had agreed to help him in securing the settlement, and that the judge assented to the proposition and stated that he would be glad to do all he could to assist Mr. Watson in effecting a settlement. He further testifies that in the same conversation a suggestion was made either by Judge Archbald or Mr. Watson that there ought to be some kind of a writing to guarantee that Mr. Watson would get the $5,000 in the event he was successful in the matter. Mr. Boland further testified that as a result of that suggestion, he went immediately to his brother, W. P. Boland, president of the Marian Coal Co., and procured a written statement, which is in the evidence, stating that in the event that Mr. Watson succeeded in bringing about a satisfactory settlement between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., that he would be paid a fee of $5,000 for his services. This is the testimony of Mr. C. G. Boland. While this conversation is not admitted it is not positively denied either by Mr. Watson or Judge Archbald in their testimony. The judge says he doesn't remember any such conversation when he, Watson, and Boland were together, but as I remember his testimony he does not positively deny the substantial facts testified to by Christopher G. Boland. The effect of Watson's testimony upon the same point is precisely similar to that of the judge. He does not remember the conversation detailed by Mr. Boland. Judge Archbald in his testimony does admit, however, that he understood that Watson was to be paid a fee of $5,000 for his services in effecting a settlement of the controversy between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and he admits and pleads in his answer that he did agree to assist Watson in his efforts to bring about that settlement through friendship for Watson and through friendship for Christopher G. Boland. The testimony shows that he did aid and assist, and did attempt to aid and assist, Mr. Watson to effect that settlement by personal interviews and conferences with railroad officials, by writing letters and by counseling with Watson with regard to the settlement.

The testimony shows that although the price that the Marian Coal Co. was to receive was fixed in the agreement at $100,000, it is further shown by the testimony and is admitted by Judge Archbald that he knew that the proposition which Mr. Watson proposed to submit to the railroad company was $161,000. The testimony does not disclose any satisfactory or reasonable excuse why the consideration was raised from $100,000 to $161,000; it is not shown by any testimony in the whole case that the Bolands ever expected at any stage of the proceedings to receive any amount in excess of $100,000 if the settlement was made. Out of this $100,000 the $5,000 fee was to be paid under the agreement, so that the net amount that the Bolands would receive on settlement was $95,000. There is no testimony in the case to show that Watson or the Bolands had any agreement with John W. Peale during any stage of these negotiations that the suit which was pending against the Marian Coal Co., in which he was plaintiff, was to be taken care of in that settlement. So the evidence offered in support of this article of impeachment shows conclusively, under our view of the case, that this United States circuit judge, this judge of the Commerce Court, did undertake, not only to aid and assist Watson, his friend, in securing the $5,000 fee, but undertook to aid and assist Watson in wrongfully demanding from the railroad company $61,000 in excess of the amount which his clients had agreed to take on settlement. If such conduct does not show that Judge Archbald acted corruptly, it is difficult for the managers to conceive what amount of testimony will be required to show corruption on the part of a judge.

In article No. 5 Judge Archbald is charged with receiving from one Frederick Warnke & Co., which company is known as the Premier Coal Co., a $500 note in consideration of favors shown by Judge Archbald to Frederick Warnke for services rendered by the judge in Warnke's behalf. Why do I say for "services rendered by Judge Archbald"? Because in respondent's answer to a charge contained in article 13, that the judge invested no money or other thing of value in any of the properties in which he acquired interests or sought to acquire interests, he makes this admission. I quote:

Respondent further admits that in the very few cases in which he was interested in the proposed purchase of culm banks or other coal property from railroad companies he did not invest any money or other thing of value except his own personal services in consideration of any interest acquired or sought to be acquired.

In view of this admission and the testimony in the case, I care not whether you call this $510 note a gift, fee, reward, or commission. The managers insist that the note was given in consideration of improper services rendered by Judge Archbald in behalf of Frederick Warnke, and this contention is abundantly established by the testimony. It is absurd to contend that it was due Judge Archbald for making a sale of the old Gravity fill, for the judge did not make that sale. It is equally absurd to contend that he was entitled to receive it as a commission by reason of the fact that he had an option on the property, for the evidence shows that he did not at the time of the sale hold any option thereon and had not for months previous to the consummation of the deal.

The sale was made by John W. Berry, agent of Lacoe & Shiffer, directly to the purchasers, and neither Judge Archbald nor John Henry Jones had anything to do with closing the deal. The facts shown by the testimony in regard to this transaction are as follows: Frederick Warnke owned a mining operation at Lorberry, which was held under a lease from the Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co., a subsidiary of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. W. J. Richards was vice president of both the coal company and the railroad company; George F. Baer was president of both companies. Mr. Warnke had purchased a two-thirds interest in this lease from one Baird Snyder under an agreement that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co. would furnish an assignment of the lease to Warnke. Mr. Warnke took possession of the property, made considerable improvements thereon preparatory to operating the same, and then called upon the coal company for the mining maps pertaining to the same, whereupon he was notified by the company that the lease under which he claimed title had been forfeited two years previously, and the coal company refused to recognize his rights in the premises. Mr. Warnke then made repeated efforts in person by conferences with Mr. Richards and President Baer to get them to reconsider their action and allow him to operate the property under a lease, which they refused to do. Then he endeavored to get them to allow him a lease on another property owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co. known as the Lincoln dump, and this they also refused to do. He then made efforts, through his attorneys and other friends, to get these officials to reconsider their action, but they persistently refused to do so. Finally he appealed to Judge Archbald and asked the judge to intercede for him with Richards, the vice president of the coal company. The judge agreed to do so and made an arrangement with Mr. Richards for an interview with him at Wilkes-Barre, which is 80 miles distant from Scranton.

Judge Archbald called on Richards at Wilkes-Barre in Warnke's behalf, but failed to get Mr. Richards to reconsider his action in regard to the lease at Lorberry or to give Mr. Warnke a lease on the Lincoln culm dump. Shortly after this occurred Mr. Warnke was employed by a brewing company to examine a property known as the old gravity fill, which they were considering purchasing from Judge Archbald and John Henry Jones, who, as already stated, at one time had an option on the property. The brewing company decided not to purchase the property and Warnke decided to consider the question of purchasing it for himself and went to John Henry Jones to inquire about the title. John Henry Jones referred him to Judge Archbald, telling him that Judge Archbald knew all about the title. Warnke then called upon Judge Archbald in the Federal building and the following occurred, as shown on page 738 of the proceedings. Warnke testified:

So I asked the judge about the title and he said he could not be my attorney. I says, "I understand you know something about these right of ways that went through this property—this Lacoe & Shiffer property." He said he did. I says, "All I want is your opinion whether you think the title is right or wrong." He told me the title as far as he knew, and he went on to explain the right of ways, and how the Pennsylvania came in possession of it, and told me then how it was dated back to Lacoe & Shiffer. I told him then that I was thinking of purchasing the property. Q. You were then asked what month or year, and you stated it was sometime in December and proceeded. Yes. So I told the judge that his information to me, as far as the title was concerned, was just as good for me as to get an attorney, and I would compensate him for it, and he says, "No; you need not do that at all." I says, "I really consider it worth to me just as much as an attorney's fee, and I would like to have you accept it from me if I purchase the property."

This testimony was given by Mr. Warnke before the Judiciary Committee, and was read to the witness when he appeared before the Senate in this trial, and after it was read the following questions were propounded to him:

Q. (By Manager DAVIS.) Is that your statement of the interview?
The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
Q. Is that correct?—A. Yes, sir.

This is all the evidence in the case pertaining to any kind of service rendered by Judge Archbald to Frederick Warnke or to any member of the company in consideration for which he demanded and received the $500 note referred to.

The facts, briefly stated, concerning the transaction which Judge Archbald had with W. W. Rissinger are these: Rissinger was the chief owner of the old Plymouth Coal Co. In 1908 he sued a number of insurance companies for a fire loss which occurred in his coal properties. Some of these cases were transferred from the State court to the United States court at Scranton, over which Judge Archbald presided on October 3. They came on for trial early in November. After the plaintiff had offered his evidence the defendant insurance companies demurred to the evidence. Judge Archbald overruled the demurrer and held that the evidence which Rissinger had offered was sufficient to send the cases to the jury, thereupon the attorney for the defendant insurance companies proposed a settlement, and after some negotiations it was agreed that judgments for about $25,000 be entered payable in 15 days, which time expired about November 28.

After these suits had been commenced Rissinger began negotiations with Judge Archbald concerning an interest in the gold-mining scheme in Honduras. He had George Russell, the promoter of the scheme, come from New York and have a conference with the judge the latter part of September. Negotiations continued until the 28th day of November. On that date Rissinger made a note for $2,500 payable to Judge Archbald and to Mrs. Hutchinson, the mother-in-law of Rissinger. This note was indorsed by Judge Archbald and delivered to Rissinger.

After some inquiry on the part of the bank as to the financial standing of Mrs. Hutchinson the bank discounted the note, and judgment was immediately taken by confession against Rissinger and Mrs. Hutchinson, his mother-in-law, but not against Judge Archbald. It seems from the evidence that the bank was relying, or had agreed to rely, solely on Rissinger and Mrs. Hutchinson for payment, as is manifest by the fact that judgment was not taken against Archbald. The note was discounted about December 12, and some two months later 84 shares of stock were issued by the Scranton Gold Mining Co., which Rissinger had organized for the purpose of taking an interest in the Honduras gold mining scheme, for which he paid nothing. He never paid any part of the $2,500 note, and was never called upon to pay it. It was paid by Rissinger, together with interest. Rissinger testified that Judge Archbald gave no obligation of any kind to pay for this stock, and he was not expected to pay for it. So far as the testimony disclosed, it was purely a gift. The judge's explanation that he understood it to be collateral security for his liability on the note is controverted by all the facts and circumstances in the case. The note ran for four months, and this stock was issued and delivered about two months after the note was given. If Judge Archbald was liable at all on the note he was liable for $2,500. Even the face value of this stock amounted only to $1,680. The stock was not assigned to Judge Archbald. It was issued originally to him by the corporation.

Why this gift from Rissinger? It was on account of one of two things. Either it had relation to the suits which Rissinger had had before Judge Archbald or it was for the purpose of giving better standing to the gold-scheme enterprise in which Rissinger was interested, and to enable Rissinger thereby to use Archbald's name for the promotion of the scheme. In either view of the case Judge Archbald was culpable, and indicates plainly that he was willing to accept gifts which had relation to his official duties, or was willing to barter the things, which came to him by reason of being judge, for filthy lucre.

Now, Mr. President, I need not discuss the doctrine of reasonable doubt. I do not think it has any real application here. I think the facts are plain and palpable. I think they are in their nature susceptible of being understood, susceptible of being construed, and I think the Senate capable of drawing its own conclusion from the admitted and proven facts. Reasonable doubt is the refuge that is invoked in behalf of the petty criminal, but, Mr. President, I do not recall in all the cases of impeachment heretofore had before the Senate of the United States that witnesses have been called to put in issue the character of the respondent.

But whether that be correct or not, this is not a case dependent upon circumstancial evidence or of such doubt that his reputation or character can save him from the inevitable result of his persistent and inexcusable course of conduct.

Mr. President, try this case by the standard of ethics promulgated by any bar association, by the standard of ethics announced by any judge, by the standard of ethics which obtains in respect to the conduct of any high-minded judge. I think I am authorized in saying that the counsel for the respondent filed a brief before the committee in the House in which they admitted improprieties and indiscretions, but claimed that they were only improprieties and indiscretions. It remained for them to come to the Senate to deny that those acts were improper and indiscreet. In effect the judge says, "Yes, I made the trades; yes, I took the money; what of it? I am in office for life; you can not get me out." Senators, what of it? His conduct was improper. His course of conduct in repeated instances shows impeachable misbehavior, impeachable misdemeanors. Take the Century Dictionary and read the meaning of the phrase "during good behavior."

During good behavior: As long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties or the conduct of one's life; as, an office held during good behavior.

In the case of State ex rel. Attorney General v. Lazarus (1 So. Rep., 376) Judge Poche said, in reference to those who framed the constitution of Louisiana:

They acted on the idea contained in the paternal recommendation of the first, the great chief justice of Louisiana, Judge Martin, when he said, "All those who minister in the temple of justice, from the highest to the lowest, should be above reproach and suspicion. None should serve at its altar whose conduct is at variance with his obligations."

Sharswood, in his work Professional Ethics, says this:

Counsel should ever remember how necessary it is for the dignified and honorable administration of justice, upon which the dignity and honor of their profession entirely depend, that the courts and the members of the courts should be regarded with respect by the suitors and people; that on all occasions of difficulty or danger to that department of government they should have the good opinion and confidence of the public on their side. Good men of all parties prefer to live in a country in which justice according to law is impartially administered. (P. 63.)

Another plain duty of counsel is to present everything in the cause to the court openly in the course of the public discharge of its duties. It is not often, indeed, that gentlemen of the bar so far forget themselves as to attempt to exert privately an influence upon the judge, to seek private interviews, or take occasional opportunities of accidental or social meetings to make ex parte statements or to endeavor to impress their views. They know that such conduct is wrong in itself and has a tendency to impair confidence in the administration of justice, which ought not only to be pure, but unsuspected. (Pp. 66, 67.)

I now read from the case of Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (43 Chancery Div. Law Rep., 384, 385), where Lord Justice Bowen said:

As the lord justice has said, nothing can be clearer than the principle of law that a person who has a judicial duty to perform disqualifies himself for performing it if he has a pecuniary interest in the decision which he is about to give or a bias which renders him otherwise than an impartial judge. If he is an accuser, he must not be a judge. If he has a pecuniary interest in the success of the accusation, he must not be a judge. Where such a pecuniary interest exists, the law does not allow any further inquiry as to whether or not the mind was actually biased by the pecuniary interest. The fact is established from which the inference is drawn that he is interested in the decision, and he can not act as a judge. But it must be in all cases a question of substance and of fact whether one of the judges has in truth also been an accuser. The question which has to be answered by the tribunal which has to decide—the legal tribunal before which the controversy is waged—must be: Has the judge whose impartiality is impugned taken any part whatever in the prosecution, either by himself or by his agents? I think it is to be regretted that these two gentlemen, as soon as they found that the person who was accused was a person against whom a complaint was being alleged by the council of a society to which they subscribed and to which they in law belonged as members, did not at once retire from the council. I think it is to be regretted, because judges, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion, and in the minds of strangers the position which they occupied upon the council was one which required explanation.

Mr. President, if it were becoming on this occasion, and if I were trained in the dramatic art, I could indulge in realism and I could picture to you this judge, sent hence unwhipped of justice, saying to the world, "I have done nothing wrong; the Senate has approved my course of conduct; my soiled garments have been washed, and the judicial ermine is restored in snowy whiteness to my shoulders." You could see him on the bench. But what, Mr. President, would the humble shipper engaged in interstate commerce think when he came to try his case before this judge and recalled his secret correspondence with and the secret arguments made by Helm Bruce, the railroad attorney, and remembered the obligations under which the railroads had put the judge? Ah, Mr. President, would that humble suitor for justice at his hands have confidence in him? Would he not think that justice would be denied to him by such a man? Let me say, any underground connection between corporations engaged in interstate commerce and Federal judges must not be tolerated or excused.

The counsel for the respondent made the Christmas bells ring; he heard the singing of the Christmas carols; he invoked love and forgiveness, those blessed attributes of our Savior, in behalf of his guilty client. But let us remember that while love and mercy are divine attributes, perhaps a higher attribute is justice. Let us remember that, long after the first Christmas carols had been sung and the Savior of mankind had reached maturity, endowed as He was with divine gifts and with the best that is in humanity as well, He had the attribute of justice; He had the impulse of righteous indignation. Wrong and outrage fired His soul, so that when He looked into the sacred temple and witnessed the profanation of that hallowed place, not love, not forgiveness, but justice was the high motive, the divine impulse that swelled in His combined nature of God and man and made him scourge from the temple the money changers who had desecrated its holy altars!

Mr. President and Senators, in behalf of the House of Representatives, I thank you for your courteous treatment of the managers; I thank you for this patient and impartial trial. I thank especially the Presiding Officer, who has so long, so patiently, and with such conspicuous fairness and ability guided these proceedings.

Mr. President, the case is now left with you and your associates in the confident belief that the people of the United States in their organic law have a remedy to expel from office a faithless judge. We confidently submit the case to the deliberation and high judgment of this Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk and have read a question which, however much it may appear on its face to be out of order, I want to ask the Senate to permit to be read to Judge Archbald for his answer. The question will show its own importance, I trust.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri sends to the desk a question which he asks permission of the Senate to have propounded to the respondent. Is there objection?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, as one of the counsel for Judge Archbald, before the question is asked, I want to say that we can not make objection to any question that is put by a Senator, provided it be understood after the answer is made that we shall have the right to address ourselves to the Senate as to the effect of the answer or its bearing upon the case.

Mr. REED. I ask now that the question be read to the Senate for its information, so that the Senate may understand the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. That the question be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has really submitted two requests. One is that the question submitted by him shall be read, and the other is that it be propounded to the witness.

Mr. REED. My request now is that the question be read to the Senate in order that the Senate may determine whether it desires to have it propounded to the witness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the question which the Senator from Missouri desires to have propounded to the respondent? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the question.

The Secretary read as follows:

You have testified that you were in doubt with reference to the proper construction to be placed upon the testimony of Mr. Compton, and that thereupon you wrote a letter to Helm Bruce, the attorney, asking him for his construction of the evidence; and you have further stated that you attached the reply written by Helm Bruce to the record. It appears in the original record that in the sentence which appears in typewriting, "We did apply it there," an alteration is made by pen and ink, a caret being inserted between the words "did" and "apply," and a line is drawn from this caret to the margin and the word "not" written. Did you make this alteration?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the purpose of the question is this: In the original record it appears that the text of the answer was actually changed, so that the record now to go before the Supreme Court goes with the word "not" written in it. I desire to know, and I think the Senate ought to know, whether Judge Archbald wrote that word "not" in that record. I ask that the question be propounded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I simply desire to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to say that the rules will not permit the Senator to do so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. I did not recollect that the testimony showed the condition which the Senator from Missouri states in his question.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, on behalf of Judge Archbald, I object to the question being put to him at this stage of the proceedings, unless his counsel may have the opportunity, after the evidence is introduced, of making an argument upon the case as it may then be presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to propounding the question?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I move that the doors be closed for deliberation.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the respondent and his counsel thereupon withdrew from the Chamber.

After 1 hour and 4 minutes the doors were reopened.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state as to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that the Senate in private conference determined that the question should not be asked.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in order to save the Senate voting upon the question in public, simply to save the time of the Senate, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hopes the Senator will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is due, in order properly to keep the record, to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. HEISKELL] has not been sworn in in this proceeding; and the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to that announcement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am authorized by the junior Senator from Arkansas to say that he has not been able to read the pleadings or the evidence; that he has come here so recently that he has heard none of the evidence and that he has heard only a part even of the argument; and that under those circumstances he does not consider that he would be quite a competent judge in deciding the grave issues that would be presented before him. He therefore asks to be excused from being sworn in as an impeachment judge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that direction will be given to it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. May I ask, Mr. President, whether the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourns to a time set?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair should have stated that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment stands adjourned until 1 o'clock to-morrow. It would have resulted that way anyhow, because that is the regular order.

The managers on the part of the House, the respondent, and his counsel thereupon withdrew.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this morning unanimous consent was asked for agreement to vote on the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases at 3 o'clock on the 20th of January. I ask consent that that be resubmitted to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry. Does it require unanimous consent to vacate the previous unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it be resubmitted.

Mr. LODGE. He asks that it be resubmitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator request unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Utah to make that request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I make the point of order that a unanimous-consent agreement can not be repealed except by unanimous consent, and that the only proper request is a request for unanimous consent to reconsider what was done by unanimous consent. I do not know what are the rules of the Senate, but I do know, as a matter of common sense, that that which can be done by unanimous consent can be undone by unanimous consent, and that that which has been done by unanimous consent can not be undone in any other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from North Dakota, and he made a motion to adjourn, and he has not withdrawn it.

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask a ruling, then, upon the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Chair's pardon. I thought that had been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate adjourn, on which the Senator from Iowa asks the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I now ask again that the question be resubmitted to the Senate for a unanimous-consent agreement setting a certain date to vote upon Senate bill 4043, upon the ground that when it was presented to the Senate this morning I was in the Chamber and did not hear it offered or read, but addressed the Chair for the purpose of objecting before any other business was transacted. I ask that it be resubmitted upon that ground.

Mr. SANDERS. I simply wish to say that this morning, without reflection, I requested that the question be resubmitted. But since then I have had time for consideration and am of the opinion that it is a question for the Chair to decide, and that what I said about reconsideration is of no effect whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I make the point of order, and if the Chair will indulge me for a few moments I will say a few words on the point of order.

The point of order which I make is that the Senate having, by unanimous consent, adopted a certain course of procedure and the decision of the Senate having been announced to the Senate—— [A pause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is listening to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point of order which I make—— [A pause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is listening to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Chair can not hear me when the Clerk is talking to him.

The point of order which I make is that unanimous consent having been once requested of the Senate, the request having been put to the Senate, the Senate having agreed to it, the temporary occupant of the chair having announced that the Senate had agreed to it, it becomes an order of the Senate by unanimous consent, and that there is no way by which the unanimous-consent order can be dispensed with except by a request for unanimous consent to reconsider or reverse the previous order.

Now, I understand that the gravamen of the argument upon the other side is this: That the Senator from Utah happened at the time to have his attention diverted to something else, and having his attention diverted he did not hear the request for unanimous consent; that as soon as he was informed of the nature of the request and of the action of the Senate and of the announcement of the Chair he arose for the purpose of saying that if his attention had been called to the request he would have objected, and then urging, as a matter of courtesy among Senators, that his objection should be taken nunc pro tunc.

Now, I admit that the main rule in the Senate is one of courtesy amongst Senators; but I submit that while the Senate owes Senators courtesy, Senators also owe the Senate courtesy. I suppose I am perhaps the most unfortunate man in this body to make this argument. I am more than half deaf, and very frequently things occur in the Senate, even when the Senate is in order, which I do not hear; but I do not think it would be in order for me—because that is my misfortune—to rise and ask the Senate, acting for 90,000,000 people, to reverse itself and to reverse its entire procedure because I had been unfortunate enough not to hear, whether the fact of my not hearing was due to the fact that I could not hear or because at the time I was doing something else, or was at the time outside the Senate Chamber.

I make the point of order, Mr. President, and I should like a ruling on it for the guidance of the Senate in the future. Perhaps, and for all I know, some ruling may have been made upon the same point in the past. I do know that at the other end of the Capitol the request would not even be considered for one second; it would have been passed by upon the curt statement of the Chair that the House had already decided the question and that that announcement could not be reversed except by unanimous consent. A Member would be permitted to make request for unanimous consent to reconsider, and if that were objected to it would fall by the wayside. My only object in making the point of order is that we may have certain guidance for the future.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not through. I was only waiting for the President to get through with the Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My only object, as I said, in making the point of order is that the Senate may have guidance for certain conduct in the future, so that we may know to a certainty by what rules we are guided.

As far as I am individually concerned, although I am in favor of the passage of the bill—not upon the ground for which gentlemen contend, but because I am absolutely a States-rights Democrat—in spite of all that, if the request for unanimous consent is made I shall not object. But I do make the point of order that a unanimous-consent agreement can not be vacated. [A pause.] I will take my seat, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hopes the Senator from Mississippi will proceed. The Chair has directed——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice that, and that is the reason I took my seat. I was about through, at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hopes the Senator will hear what the Chair was about to say. He had directed the Secretary not to interfere.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All I have to add is that if the question is put, and if I shall be listening and hear it, I shall not make objection to the request for unanimous consent, because I think there was a certain amount of misfortune about the matter; but I do want a decision of the occupant of the chair and the Senate upon the question whether a unanimous consent once granted by the Senate, deliberately, too, because it was deliberately granted, although the Senator from Utah happened not to hear it; the request was very deliberately made; and the then occupant of the chair, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] very deliberately put the question—well, I beg the pardon of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but a mere shaking of his head will not destroy my impression. My question is whether, after that is done, a unanimous consent granted by the Senate, in open session, after an open request, after an open demand, and after a query by the Chair "Is there objection?" and after an open announcement that "The Chair hears none," can be vacated in any other possible way than by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think a unanimous consent once made can be vacated by another unanimous consent, for there is no proof whatever that those who agreed to vacate were all present when the unanimous consent was given. Of those who were present when the unanimous consent was given, some may be absent, and it has always been held here that unanimous consent could not be vacated. This is not an attempt to vacate a unanimous consent. I was not present when this occurred this morning; I was in a conference and heard no part of it. I am speaking simply to the parliamentary question involved. This is not, as I understand, a question of vacating unanimous consent. It proceeds upon the proposition that no unanimous consent was ever properly given, that no unanimous consent ever existed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator submit to an interrogation?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How, then, can the Senate give a unanimous consent except by some Senator requesting it, the Chair announcing the request to the Senate, and then waiting a due time and asking if there is objection, and then saying that the Chair hears none, and then announcing that the consent has been given? Is there any other way in which the Senate can give unanimous consent?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it has occurred again and again in this Senate. I have heard it year after year. I have heard the occupant of the chair say, "Is there objection?" and hearing none, state that the order is made, and then some Senator, who has been trying to engage his attention, raises the point that he had not been observed.

I heard the late Vice President Sherman say more than once, "If that is the case, the Chair will resubmit the question." As I say, I am not speaking of the merits of what happened to-day, but the adequacy of this unanimous consent was called in question, as I understand, immediately after it was announced, that it had never been properly given, that the question was raised at once, and discussion was cut off only by the arrival of the hour of 1 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit an interruption one second——

Mr. LODGE. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may be wrong, but I do not understand the facts to be as the Senator from Massachusetts states them. I understand the fact to be that in between the time when the occupant of the chair announced that he heard no objection and the time when he made the announcement that the order would be granted there was intervening business, I think, by the Senator from Minnesota. Now, if there is any doubt about that, I would like to have the record read.

Mr. LODGE. It was read this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I heard it and I heard the stenographer read it later, and what he read was this: That at that time the Senator from Utah rose, and then he said that the Senator from Minnesota, or somewhere else—I do not remember where—rose, and the Chair recognized the other Senator and attended to the business which he had in hand, and then, after that, the Senator from Utah was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. That is a question of recognition, and not of objection to it at once. The Senator from Utah, if I am correctly informed—I was not present—was on his feet asking recognition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He may have intended to object, and did not. In other words, the Chair recognized——

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, I have never before in my experience in the Senate, when the granting of a unanimous consent has been questioned, seen any attempt made to prevent a resubmission. There is no other way of getting at it.

But on the question of the point of order, I would call the attention of the Chair to the ruling made by Mr. Frye, which I remember. He said:

> The Chair can not rule on a question arising from a unanimous-consent agreement; it is for the Senators themselves to determine what it means.

It is not a matter of rule. It is a matter of unanimous consent and agreement.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me it is too important a question to be decided at this late hour in a thin Senate. I should have made no objection to the unanimous consent; I should have assented to it very cheerfully, but I think it is of the utmost importance in the conduct of the business of the Senate that there should never be unanimous consent about which any Senator or Senators have any doubt as to its fairness or about the way in which it was obtained.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know what question is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asked for a resubmission of the question as to whether or not there should be unanimous consent. The Senator from Mississippi raised a point of order upon that request to the effect that a unanimous consent once granted can not be set aside by another unanimous consent. The Chair understands that to be the point of the Senator, and that is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not asked for unanimous consent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think the point of order is so well taken that I shall not attempt to make any further argument upon it. I believe, as the Senator from Mississippi has said, that this question can not now be resubmitted. Certainly the Senator from Utah can not ask for a reconsideration, for I do not believe that he could pretend that he voted for it; and no question can be open for a reconsideration except by a Senator who votes for the particular question.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me one moment, you can not reconsider a unanimous-consent agreement, of course.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the point I make.

Mr. LODGE. No reconsideration is possible.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the point I was making. As to the procedure this morning, I had the floor when the Senate went into session as a court, and I attempted then to say that the request for this special order was considered deliberately. It was offered by the Senator from Tennessee; it was read by the Secretary; and the Chair propounded the question to the Senate, Is there objection? I was sitting in my seat and I paid particular attention to what was going on.

It is true, as the record shows, that the Senator from Utah rose in his seat after the announcement, but another Senator was recognized. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] was recognized, and other business was done before the Senator from Utah was recognized.

So I contend, Mr. President, that this question can not now be resubmitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question of order raised by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Chair would state that if this were asking to set aside a recognized unanimous-consent agreement the Chair would undoubtedly hold that that could not be done; but the Chair does not understand that to be the question.

The present occupant of the chair was not occupying the chair when the incident occurred which is now the subject matter of discussion, and was not in the Chamber. The Chair is informed, however, that the motion to resubmit is based upon the contention that there was an immediate objection to it, and a statement that it was not heard.

The Chair thinks the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has correctly stated the practice of the Senate; but it has been the practice of the Senate, certainly within the administration of the late Vice President, whenever a result was announced by him, and Senators would challenge the correctness of it, stating that they had not agreed to it and had not had the opportunity to interpose an objection, in a very great many cases the Vice President has promptly said that he would again submit the question.

That, the Chair understands, is the nature of the proposition which is now made by the Senator from Utah. It involves the question whether or not it has been finally submitted to the Senate and agreed to by unanimous consent.

The Chair would not undertake to decide that for the Senate, but he thinks it is entirely competent for the Senate to determine whether or not there has or has not been unanimous consent. Therefore the Chair will submit to the Senate for its determination the question whether there has or has not been unanimous consent, and he will submit it in the form of a motion for resubmission, which would involve the same question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Massachusetts has said about the importance of the question which is now before us and the argument which he made as to why one unanimous consent should not be allowed to be set aside by another unanimous consent, to wit, that the same group of Senators who gave the unanimous consent might not be upon the floor when it was attempted to set it aside, it seems to me the same argument exists why a unanimous-consent agreement once granted should not be resubmitted after the expiration of such a long period of time as eight hours, and for the same reason—that the same Senators may not be on the floor now who were on the floor when the agreement was entered into.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator assumes that consent has been granted. The point of contention, as I understand it, is that it never was granted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand what the Senator means to claim upon that point.

Mr. LODGE. I do not claim it. I was not present, and know nothing of the fact.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assumed the Senator claimed it now.

Mr. LODGE. I do not claim anything; I do not know.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. I make this claim: That the record shows that the consent was granted, as read by the stenographer this morning from his notes; and the question is whether a consent having been granted it shall stand when certain Senators intended to object, but by excusable inadvertence perhaps were not allowed; that they attempted to address the Chair, but were not recognized for the purpose, as was the case of the Senator from Utah. Whatever may be the merits of submitting the question by the Chair at that time, when the same Senators were on the floor, it seems to me it may be a grave question whether it ought to be submitted, as I said, at a period eight hours subsequent to the granting of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that we adjourn until to-morrow morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say this irrespective of any opinion I may have on the bill. It is immaterial to me, as far as the pending bill is concerned, which way it is decided, but it is of great importance, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi, to have it decided, so that Senators may be able to rely upon a unanimous-consent agreement and have a uniform practice in relation to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. In reply to the Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. If there is one thing more important than any other in a unanimous-consent agreement, it is that Senators should feel that they must carry it out in the most rigid good faith, and it should be obtained with the utmost possible fairness. Otherwise you will have no unanimous-consent agreements. These do not exist under rules. There is not a rule in the world that relates to them. They are mere agreements among Senators, and the Chair, as I have read Senator Frye, refuses to rule upon them at all. It is very important, in my judgment, to maintain the character of a unanimous-consent agreement.

I know nothing about this case. I should have given my consent. I know nothing about this case except that it is disputed that it was ever fairly given, and I think that is a very serious matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose a unanimous consent stands upon our calendar, where Senators feel that they had not given consent, is there any power in the Chair to enforce it? Can it not be disregarded by the Senate if Senators see fit to do so?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely. I will read what Senator Frye said at the same time. The President pro tempore further said:

> The responsibility of violating the agreement must rest with the Senators themselves. The Chair has no power to enforce it.

Mr. STONE. I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator. A unanimous consent agreement is a question that rests in the honor of Senators.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. STONE. The order for it, when fairly made, ought not to be violated.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. STONE. When a unanimous consent has been asked for, and even where the Chair held that he hears no objection, and it has been entered in a formal way, and a Senator rises and makes the inquiry that was made by the Senator from Utah this morning, it has been the uniform practice of the Senate, as I understand and as I have observed over and over again during my service, for the Chair to say that the question will be again submitted. It seems to me that the practices of the Senate in that respect, so uniform and long continued, are entitled to as much respect and consideration in a matter of this kind as the unanimous consent itself.

Mr. LODGE. I agree. All I have been contending for is the character of the unanimous consent. In this particular one I have no objection or interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, because I want to get it into my mind as to what my duty shall be in future. I want to do what is right in the Senate. I understand, now, if the Senate can set aside this officially announced unanimous-consent agreement—whether it be by unanimous consent or not, it has been so officially announced and appears in the RECORD—because a Senator was having his attention momentarily diverted, what would be the rule about a man who did not hear because he was still further incapacitated by deafness, and what would be the rule about a Senator who did not hear it because he was outside of the Chamber? In other words, where are we to draw the line? If there be one official announcement by unanimous consent that is to be vacated on account of courtesy merely, a most highly estimable private virtue, then where are you to draw the line? Are you to draw it merely where a Senator was engaged in conversation, and therefore did not hear, or are you to draw it where a Senator is incapacitated in one ear and had that ear presented, and therefore did not hear, or are you to draw it because a Senator was engaged in necessary committee work and therefore was not present? Where are you to draw it and within what limit or time?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him where the Senate has drawn the line. It has always drawn the line on a Senator who was present and who said to the Senate that he had not heard or that he had not been recognized in time, but not on a Senator who was absent from the Chamber. He was bound by the consent, because he was absent at his own risk when he knew it was likely to come up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would be glad to see that rule established. I want to know what is the rule.

Mr. LODGE. If a unanimous-consent agreement was adopted, and the Senator from Mississippi failed for any reason to hear it, and then it was brought to his attention and he should rise and say to the Chair, "I have not heard what was being asked; I ask that it be resubmitted," I think under the uniform practice of the Senate it would be resubmitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would suit me remarkably well. What I want to have is a uniform rule on the subject.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] was recognized and made the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not recognize the Senator from North Dakota on that statement. The Chair did not even hear the statement. It is not too late, if the Senator now makes it.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the want of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 8 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 11, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 10, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, that though there are wide differences of opinion among men upon questions of theology, there is great unanimity of opinion upon pure religion and the questions of ethics. Since long before the ten great commandments were written on the tables of stone they were written in the hearts of men, so that above the value of wealth, of position, of everything else in this world a premium is set upon honesty, integrity, sobriety, and virtue. There is nothing stronger than faith, purer than virtue, warmer than love, nor more enduring than hope, and we pray that these things may live and grow until pure and undefiled religion shall be shed abroad in every heart. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE HANNA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

FARGO, N. DAK., January 2, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: This is to advise you that I have this day tendered to Hon. John Burke, governor of North Dakota, my resignation as a Representative in Congress from the State of North Dakota; said resignation to take effect January 7, 1913.

Sincerely, L. B. HANNA.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House Documents Nos. 1226 and 1228, Sixty-second Congress, estimates for appropriations for Benecia Arsenal, Benecia, Cal., and the same were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 771.

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds is hereby authorized, under the direction and supervision of the commission, to rearrange and reconstruct the Hall of the House of Representatives and, within a total expenditure not exceeding $25,000, to procure and install the necessary furniture and furnishings in the Hall of Representatives for accommodating and seating the Members of the House of the Sixty-third Congress, and to do all such other things, under said direction and supervision and within said limit of cost, as may be necessary in the preparation of the Hall of Representatives for the assembling of the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask if this contemplates the removal of the desks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement to the House: The present House has 396 Members, and now there are 400 seats and desks. The next House will have 435 Members. Several weeks ago, at my suggestion, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds prepared a number of plans for rearrangement of the House, experimentally, to accommodate all of the Members. The commission to rearrange and reconstruct the Hall, under a statute passed a few years ago, met and had these various plans before it and decided to put in temporarily, or experimentally, benches without desks. It will require the rearrangement of the risers upon which the present desks are located. If the matter is to be done within the month of March, it is necessary that the superintendent be authorized to make the necessary contracts for the construction of the seats at once. It was believed desirable during the extra session to try out whether the House could do business permanently without desks, and it is believed to be important to have that trial before directions are given to make the permanent changes in the Hall directed some years ago. The purpose of this resolution is to provide for the rearrangement of the House so that during the extra session of the Sixty-third Congress which is to be held the business of the House will be transacted without desks, with an arrangement by which there will be two tables placed in the fore part of the Hall, at which men in charge of bills shall be expected to take their place at such times.

Mr. FOSTER. My recollection is that the plan submitted at one time was that there should be tables on either side of the aisle, back in the body of the Hall.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The particular location is somewhat indefinite. The plan contemplates taking out the first row, at present, of these seats, and desks will be located wherever, after the work has progressed, it is deemed most desirable and convenient to have them.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit, the tentative plan does not contemplate now any change in the walls?

Mr. FITZGERALD. None whatever. But it will be necessary to arrange the risers or steps in order to bring the Members as closely together as is possible with such an arrangement, and if no change were made in them it would be impossible to tell whether there would be any advantage in having them more compactly together. It is necessary, in order to make arrangements for the next Congress, that work begin at once on whatever is to be done.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a question? Will the gentleman be willing to add a line as to better ventilation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is impossible within the time that will elapse to do anything toward changing the ventilation of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that I think I could provide better ventilation by shutting all the doors here and giving us direct ventilation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am basing my statement largely on the technical advice of men who have made an exhaustive study of this Chamber. At any rate, it would require such alterations in the Chamber as could not be possibly made in the time available.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would there be any objection to changing the ventilation so as to protect the health of the Members?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am heartily in favor of doing so, and I shall be very glad to have the gentleman bring his suggestions to the commission.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I believe we have a Committee on Acoustics and Ventilation, have we not? Possibly it will be proper to refer it to that committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that committee no longer exists.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There should be such a committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It finished its labors and has been abolished.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is, as I understand, Private Calendar day, set apart for pension business. I desire to submit this offer for unanimous consent: Inasmuch as the Post Office appropriation bill is pending and the gentlemen in charge of it are anxious to continue with it, I ask unanimous consent that the day following the completion of that bill, provided it does not fall on Monday or Wednesday, shall be set aside as a substitute for to-day, with all of the business that could come before the House to-day permissible on that day.

The SPEAKER. This is Private Calendar day, with the preference in favor of the pension committees, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] submits a request for unanimous consent that the first day after the Post Office appropriation bill has been completed, provided it does not fall on Monday or Wednesday, shall be substituted for this day. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would not the gentleman make his request that only pension bills on the Private Calendar be considered on that day?

Mr. RUSSELL. Some gentlemen have spoken to me about other bills pending on the Private Calendar, and requested that all the rights of the day be permissible as to such bills on that day. I did not want to cut out anybody.

Mr. MANN. Well, probably we would not go ahead with anything except pension bills if we had such a day set apart, and I think the consideration of pension bills only should be provided for on that day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office appropriation is reported; the Committee on Military Affairs is ready to report the Army appropriation bill, and the Committee on Appropriations is practically ready to report the fortifications appropriation bill. Only two of the general appropriation bills have passed the House thus far. Under those circumstances I am not able to consent to setting apart any day for any special class of bills. If the House desires to transact private business in preference to public business that must be enacted before the 4th of March, it must be so determined under the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask, if this motion prevails, whether or not there will be any chance for considering the pension bills pending on the calendar until two weeks from to-day?

The SPEAKER. There would not be. If gentlemen want to consider this appropriation bill, they will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. If they want to take up the Private Calendar, they will vote against the gentleman's motion.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed now to consider the pension bills on the Private Calendar in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of resolving the House into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Post Office appropriation bill will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-five gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this question the "ayes" are 42 and the "noes" are 45.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 144, answered "present" 7, not voting 147, as follows:

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am paired with him, and I desire to change my vote and to vote "present."

Mr. MANN. I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded present.

Mr. PARRAN. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT, and desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider House bill 27475.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider pension bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Do I understand that the Chair is submitting the motion as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

The SPEAKER. The Chair is submitting the motion as it ought to be stated.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUSSELL) there were—ayes 91, noes 37.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the presence of a quorum has just been disclosed, and that the point of no quorum is dilatory. There has been no other business transacted since the presence of a quorum was disclosed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There has been other business transacted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point is dilatory.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the vote was?

The SPEAKER. The vote was 91 ayes and 37 noes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does it not appear from that vote that there is no quorum?

The SPEAKER. On a yea-and-nay vote immediately before this the presence of a quorum was developed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The quorum may have left the Hall, and the rising vote just taken shows that there is less than a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. There were 240 Members here on the roll call.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; and only 128 have voted on this question.

The SPEAKER. That is not conclusive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the invariable practice is that when no business intervenes between a roll call and a division the point of no quorum is held to be dilatory.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There was business intervening, namely, the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider pensions.

The SPEAKER. It was on that motion. The invariable practice since the Chair has been a Member of this House, 18 years, has been that where a roll call develops a good, substantial quorum, and the point of no quorum has been made before any other business is transacted, a quorum has been assumed to be present. The Chair has been very liberal about construing that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I just want to call attention to the fact that the assumption of the Chair is probably not correct. The roll call shows that it is not.

The SPEAKER. No; the roll call did not show that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I mean to say that the last vote did.

The SPEAKER. That can not show it, because a whole lot of Members sat around who did not stand up at all. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. MURRAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 27475, and I ask that it be reported.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the first pension bill on the calendar, which is the bill the Clerk is about to read. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. TILSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is recognized.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask whether bills from the Military Affairs Committee have not been considered on the same footing with pension bills?

Mr. RUSSELL. Pension bills have precedence on the second Friday of the month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule as indicated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]. The Chair reads from page 390 of the Manual:

> On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims—

And so forth. Under that provision private pension claims are preferred on this Friday.

Mr. TILSON. Would the Chair hold that immediately after the pension bills have been disposed of bills from the Military Affairs Committee to remove disabilities would be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be prepared to rule on that question when the pension bills have been disposed of.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a point of order, that the first pension bill is not in order unless the bill is first on the Private Calendar. I call the attention of the Chair to section 847, page 375, of the Manual, which is as follows:

> In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee.

Now, I respectfully submit that the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] was that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. Under section 847 bills on the Private Calendar come up in their regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from Georgia seems to have fallen into the error that the motion as put by the Speaker was to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair heard the Speaker put the motion, and it was put that the House go into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of the consideration of private pension bills.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And the language the Speaker referred to appears specifically in the rule, it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order:

On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion.

It is purely a matter of language, and under the rule private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing charges of desertion are all of equal priority and equal dignity, and the language does not give private pension bills any priority over the right to call up a bill for the removal of disabilities I have referred to, and the Chair will find no ruling where it has ever been so held.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the last statement of the gentleman from Georgia is quite correct, nor do I understand that the Chair has ruled otherwise. Pension bills, bills to remove political disabilities, bills to remove the charge of desertion have equal standing on the second and fourth Fridays of each month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I understood that was the position of the Chair, but I understood the position of the gentleman from Georgia was that other bills on the calendar could be taken up ahead of these bills. The rule gives the preference to these bills on this day.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I am in thorough accord with the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman is, the Chair will rule that under the terms of the rule, as stated on page 390 of the Manual, to which the Chair has referred, on the second and fourth Fridays of the month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims, bills to remove political disabilities, and bills to remove the charge of desertion. The Clerk will report the first bill of that character on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the bill I ask to have considered is a pension bill on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill to remove a political disability comes ahead of that bill which the gentleman desires to have considered at this time.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 27475, which is a private pension bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not the first bill under the rule on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken, because the committee has the right to determine which bill shall be taken up for consideration and in what order. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order and will put the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the gentleman's motion that the committee proceed to consider the bill S. 4778, an act to correct the military record of John T. Haines.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the bill I asked to be considered is a pension bill and the first pension bill on the Private Calendar.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the substitute is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Missouri is not well taken.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the bill which the gentleman from Georgia proposes to substitute is not in order, because it is not a bill to remove a political disability nor to remove a charge of desertion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, since the bill is not a bill to remove a charge of desertion, but is a bill to correct the military record of John T. Haines. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion made by the gentleman from Missouri is that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 27475, a private pension bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I move to amend by way of substitute that the Committee of the Whole now proceed to consider the bill H. R. 15241, a bill for the relief of Fred R. Payne.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that is not a privileged bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, and after reference to the bill the Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment, by way of substitute, that the committee now take up for consideration the bill (S. 6408) for the relief of Margaret McQuade.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory. The gentleman has already proposed two amendments that were clearly not in order, and the purpose is apparent that it is merely to obstruct the transaction of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unwilling to determine at this time that the point of order is well taken, for the reason that while the two bills referred to are not in order under the rule, this one may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is apparent that the gentleman by doing this is not attempting to have the committee consider the bill, but merely to obstruct business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the bill is not within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, that the bill is not within the rule.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment, by way of substitute, that the committee proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 5221) granting a pension claim to Joseph Hunter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is dilatory. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the committee proceed to consider the bill H. R. 27475.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 97, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 27475, is a private pension bill that is very moderate in length, and, we think, very reasonable and just in its provisions. It contains in all 237 items, and in this there are 57 widows of old soldiers. There are sometimes objections made to the passing of private pension bills to-day because, they say, that at the last session of this Congress we passed a general pension bill, known as the Sherwood bill. But that objection can not reasonably be made to a bill like this, because of the fact that the Sherwood pension bill did not include any widows in its provisions.

Again, there are a number of parties in this bill who are drawing very small pensions under the general law, by reason of being young in years. And under this bill some of those are granted pensions at $20, some at $24, some at $25, and so on. This is not an extravagant bill. The total amount of money carried by this bill per annum is $68,112, about half of which is now being paid under the general law, so that this bill provides for an increase of only about $34,056 per annum—not an extravagant sum.

Mr. Chairman, your committee has endeavored as diligently and as carefully as it could to investigate these cases, and we confidently believe that they are meritorious—many of the old soldiers being blind, many of them bedfast, and some of them upon crutches. We believe that the provisions of this bill are just and that it ought to be promptly passed.

I reserve, Mr. Chairman, the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman yields, may I ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I ask for information. I notice in several cases in this bill—it may be customary in the law, but I am not familiar enough with it to know—where you provide an increase of pension for a widow to cover a dependent child you provide in the case of death that "the pension herein shall cease and determine." Under that provision, will the pension which the widow already draws come back to her?

Mr. RUSSELL. The pension which the widow draws in her own right would continue to her. The pension provided as payable to her because of the helpless child will cease at the death of the child.

Mr. MANN. I was attracted by the language of the bill, which may have been construed as I say. I do not know whether that is true here or not. It provides in the case of a widow to pay her a pension of $24 a month in lieu of that she is now receiving. Of course, $12 of it is intended for the widow and $12 for the dependent child, with the further provision if the child dies then the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine. What I wished to inquire was whether or not there was a construction under which the widow in the case of the death of the child would obtain the pension she is now receiving, although this language seems to strike out that pension.

Mr. RUSSELL. The construction has always been, as I understand, that when a helpless child dies that part of the pension ceases, and the widow continues to draw only what she has drawn in her own right.

Mr. MANN. This is the usual language, then?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; that is the usual language in such cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 27874) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and the widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is informed that there is already a bill being considered before the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought you were through with that bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Our bill is not finished yet.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the bill offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] and the bill offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] be considered contemporaneously and together.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. RUSSELL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I see no reason why I should not be a member of this committee, unless I am debarred on account of my pension attitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making a lengthy argument at this time, but I propose when this bill is read to show to this committee that the chairman of the Pension Committee is not fair in the statement he has made. He is usually very fair, I concede, and I have conceded to him that fairness frequently on the floor of this House, but he is certainly not fair in the statement he has made here to-day. He undertakes to lead the Members of the House to believe that all the names included in this bill—about 300—are those that can not be provided for under the general law, and I am here to say to you, sir, that there are a number of persons in that bill who are drawing pensions under the Sherwood Act of 1912, and almost before the ink on that bill is dry you are here to-day asking that those pensions be increased.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not state that this bill did not contain any of the names of pensioners who are drawing pensions under the general law. I said that the 57 widows in this bill did not draw any pension under the general law, and that there were several soldiers included in this bill who by reason of being young in years or of having served a short time did not get what we believed they were entitled to considering their physical condition, and that this bill is an increase of cases of that sort.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am here to say that some of these young men that the gentleman refers to are deserters; they are bounty jumpers, as shown by this bill and the record connected with the bill. I am here to say to you that not only deserters and bounty jumpers are carried in this bill but negroes are here provided for when they can not draw pensions under the Sherwood bill. I am here to say to you that there is a negro widow in this bill who has been increased to $20 a month, who is not a war widow, and that there are war widows in this bill, white, from one end of it to the other, who are from 75 to 100 years old, that are drawing only $12 a month.

Now, I want to know what the constituents of these gentlemen who prepared this bill here are going to say, back at home, when they are faced with the statements and the charges that I am making here to-day, and I am prepared to prove these charges.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we stand here to-day with this bill full of deserters, full of bounty jumpers, full of people who are not entitled to draw pensions under the law, after the country had been promised last session, when the Sherwood bill was passed, that this House would no more be flooded with pension bills. Here we are confronted with 300 to-day, and we were confronted with 300 two weeks ago—over 600 up to the present time. Half of this session has gone. This House has considered only two appropriation bills. There are appropriation bills that are waiting now, carrying nearly a billion dollars—the naval bill, for instance; the agricultural bill; measures in which the people of this country are interested—and we have got only 38 days more to consider 12 appropriation bills, carrying a billion of dollars. And here we are to-day held up with a private pension bill, pensioning deserters, negroes, and bounty jumpers, who are not entitled to draw pensions under the laws of the United States, after we have been burdened with $180,000,000 for the payment of pensions since the enactment of the Sherwood Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss these cases as they come up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for an hour if he wishes to use the time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to make an inquiry of the Chair before proceeding. Does the Chair hold that any other subject may be discussed in general debate, as is usual on appropriation bills? The custom in general debate on appropriation bills generally is to discuss any subject that is desired to be discussed—that is, in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule of practice provides:

> In Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union during general debate the Member need not confine himself to the subject (v., 5233–5238); but this privilege does not extend to the Committee of the Whole House (v., 5239).

We are now in Committee of the Whole, and the discussion would have to be confined to the subject of the bill pending.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I just wanted to know what we could talk about. If it were in order, I would wish to talk on the Post Office appropriation bill, so as to save some of the time for general debate that this House took away from that committee this morning. But while I may not agree fully with the views of the Chair as to the rule, or certainly as to the practice of the House, yet I do not desire to transgress the ruling of the Chair on that subject, and I will confine myself to the matters connected with this particular bill, and only for a little while.

Mr. Chairman, it is altogether out of order for me or for any other Member of this House to censure or to criticize the actions of this body upon any measure that comes before it, but I believe that I would be derelict to the duty that I owe to this House and to this country if I let this occasion pass without at least suggesting that the policy pursued with reference to the adoption of the order that brings this bill before the House is unwise.

We have here a vast number of appropriation bills, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] has said, with but little time in which to pass them; and yet we saw to-day, by a vote of this House, the largest bill ever presented to it in all of its history, and perhaps the most important, carrying 278,000,000 of money to be used for the benefit of the people all over this great Republic—we saw that bill sidetracked on a motion in the interest of a petty pension bill.

I would not make objection but for the apparent hypocrisy indicated in that vote. I recollect that on the floor of this House, when the pension bill a year ago was before this body, after a Democratic caucus had ordered it to be introduced and ordered it to be passed and it was reported, I saw a large and overwhelming majority of the Democrats from one section of this country repudiate the action of the party and vote against that pension bill. I believe that only three other gentlemen besides myself living south of Mason and Dixon's line supported the party on that measure.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will not yield for the present, thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say that I do not censure those gentlemen for that; not in the slightest. That is their judgment, and not mine. They have a right to do as they want to. I mention it only in order to call the attention of the House to the fact that this morning many of those Democrats who were unwilling to support that measure looking to the protection of the Union soldiers of the United States were exceedingly anxious to take up this little bill to provide a few thousand dollars for deserters. The issue is not before the country now. That election is passed. The prejudices that they thought would exist against them in the South, and which did, for I had to meet them in my own district, have passed. They are very friendly to a pension bill now. You reinstate yourselves with the voters, with the soldiers. I do not propose to be put in any wrong position about it. I am going to support this measure at the proper time. I am opposing its passage now because it was wrong to present it until these appropriation bills are passed. Until they are determined—until they are passed—we owe the obligation to this country to look after the general business of the country first, and these minor matters last.

I have no fear of the soldiers in the section of country that I live in being opposed to this position, because they are now, as they have always been, patriotic men who look to the best interests of a common country and its general welfare under general laws before a petty measure of this character.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to ask the gentleman in the first place if he is not mistaken about the Sherwood bill having been made a caucus measure?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I do not think I am. It may not have been a formal caucus, but it was the judgment of the Democratic Party that it should pass.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will permit me—he would not yield to me just now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Call it a caucus measure if you want to. It makes no difference to me. It was reported by a Democratic committee—a majority of them—to this House, which is practically the same thing, and you did not have the courage to vote for it then. You are trying to deceive the people about that measure now.

Mr. RUSSELL. The rules of the House set apart to-day as a special day for bills of this sort, do they not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think they do.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then in asking to call up the bill to-day we were within our rights under the rules of this House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am not objecting to the gentleman calling it up. It is just a piece of bad judgment and a want of good sense, in my judgment, to take up a measure of this sort, in view of the fact that great appropriation bills ought to be taken up and considered.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will ask you if the acting chairman of the Pension Committee did not ask unanimous consent to set apart the day following the completion of the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; and there was no objection on my part to that.

Mr. RUSSELL. But there was objection made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly; and I do not want to be understood as saying that the gentleman was not within his rights under the rules, because he was, but I do want to be understood as saying that it is unwise policy for the Democratic Party to pretend here that the interests of a few pensioners are a higher order of legislation than the great appropriation bills before this House. Let us deal fairly with the country on that question. I am as good a Democrat as ever lived, and I have a right to criticize my party in this House and out of it in the interest of my country, and I will do it whenever I feel like it, regardless of what any man thinks of it. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why this bill should pass to-day. I am not opposed to the bill itself. I am simply opposed to its consideration now. I think this House ought to understand that whenever it undertakes to override a committee that has a bill of the importance of the Post Office appropriation bill, when the time is so short, if Members are going to play politics, two can play at that game, and this bill will pass, if it passes at all, over my objection, simply as an earnest protest against a senseless method of procedure.

Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I desire to say in a general way upon this measure. There are in this bill a number of pension claims which were introduced by me. I am, perhaps, as much interested in the passage of this bill, from a personal point of view, as any man in this House. I think that in the general public interest a bill ought to have been brought in here that would cover the legitimate pension cases pending in the office to the extent of perhaps 400, as I am informed, instead of 200, which you now propose to pass, and assume you have made good to the soldiers of this country on the subject of pensions.

I have waited to see the chairman of this committee present to this House his report and the reasons why each one of these measures should pass. We are not here to pass a pension bill in omnibus form without knowing the merits of each measure involved in it. Here are omnibus 200 bills. You propose to shoot them through on this occasion without any explanation of them. I assume that because the chairman has not offered to have read to this House the meager and insufficient report that has been made upon these measures.

But for what it is worth, in order that the House may have some reasons to act or not act upon this question, I ask that in the balance of my time so much of the report as can be read shall be read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the gentleman's request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] requests that the report of the committee on this bill be read in his time.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAKER). The gentleman from Illinois objects. It is therefore the duty of the Chair to submit the question to the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just send that report down here. I am a pretty fair reader myself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his request?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am going to take my time in reading this report myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request. He will proceed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee (reading)—

The following are the facts ascertained by the committee concerning the case of each beneficiary in said bills and the conclusions of the committee as to the proper amount of pension or increases which should be granted.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Can the gentleman read this against the objection of a Member?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I guess I can, as a part of my speech which I am making here now.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is reading from a report which is already before this House. He is not reading a speech of his own. I make the parliamentary inquiry whether he can do that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman is assuming something that he does not know anything about. I am reading from this report, and I propose to comment on it a little in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut insist on his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. TILSON. I ask for information whether the gentleman can read this report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And comment upon it.

Mr. TILSON. Whether against objection he can read a report to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The view of the Chair is that the gentleman will be permitted to read anything in his own time if it is germane and a legitimate argument concerning the bill before the committee. And this being the report of the committee, undoubtedly it would be germane, and the gentleman is entitled to read it, or as much of it as he can within his time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I make the point of order that the report is so inconsistent with the facts in the case that it is not germane to the bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The Chair assumes that the committee understood what they were doing, and made a legitimate report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the report says:

H. R. 87. William Andrews, aged 64 years, served as a private in Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Michigan Volunteers, from July 31, 1862, to June 26, 1865, and is now a pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 per month on account of lumbago and disease of heart. He had a prior service in Company E, Ninth Michigan Volunteers, from September 20 to October 24, 1861, when he deserted.

I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri, who has charge of the bill, what was the character of the party, and how did you pension him when the record shows that he had deserted?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not recall the facts of the case.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I judged that the gentleman did not, and that is the reason I asked him.

Mr. RUSSELL. What is the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is H. R. 87, on page 3 of the report.

Mr. RUSSELL. He had been pensioned in the Pension Bureau, and the bureau does not pension anybody unless they have an honorable discharge.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But you say here that he did not have an honorable discharge, and then you give no reason why you override the amount given in the Pension Bureau. What about that?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not prepare every one of these reports; they are prepared by the secretary of the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I accept the gentleman's apology. If the gentleman is not prepared to answer, and if he does not know anything about the measure which is before the House, let some Member who is familiar with it answer.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do know something about the measure.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman does not seem to know much about this case.

Mr. RUSSELL. I can not answer the question that the gentleman asked just now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is there anybody on the committee that can answer? It appearing that the chairman nor any man on the committee can give a reason for the passage of the bill, I will ask whether it is not about time that this House should be able to learn something about the measures pending before it?

Let us pass along and take up another one. Perhaps we can find somebody that knows something about it.

H. R. 111. Emma L. Cole, about 61 years of age, is the widow of William C. Cole, who served as acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, from August 21, 1863, to October 5, 1863, and from October 31, 1863, to December 17, 1864, and who died December 29, 1902, of paralysis, while a pensioner under the general law at $30 per month on account of an injury to the lower jaw and back received in line of duty in September, 1864.

The claimant, who married the surgeon on January 3, 1870, sought pension under the general law, but her claim was properly rejected in July, 1908, upon the ground that her husband's fatal paralysis had no connection with the disabilities for which he was pensioned and was not otherwise shown to have been due to his military service.

She also sought pension under the act of June 27, 1890, but this claim was likewise rejected on the ground that her husband was neither an enlisted man nor a commisioned officer in the military establishment.

Claimant is a resident of Van Wert, Ohio, and is shown by proof filed with your committee to have no property and to be dependent upon her own labor for a support.

Congress having repeatedly granted relief to the men who served as contract surgeons and to the widows of such persons, like relief is believed to be warranted in this case, and a pension of $12 per month is therefore recommended.

I will ask the gentleman if this committee is not confined to granting pensions under the law, and if it is usual for the committee where upon a state of facts that is made out here the claimant is not entitled to be granted a pension as would a soldier, but simply a widow who, not falling under the operation of the general law, practically is a civil pensioner?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that as a matter of course the Pension Committee is not confined to cases where they may obtain a pension from the bureau. If they did, the widow could obtain this pension without coming to the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is no difference between the gentleman and myself on that. I understand the power of this Congress grants a pension under any conditions. I am questioning the policy of surrounding the law and granting a pension which might be proper under a general law to the soldier but which granted to the widow under the facts stated here makes her a civil pensioner.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is the gentleman opposed to any pensions of that sort?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I am for them if they are all right and within the law, but I want a reason in each case.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman knows very well that the reports can not be as complete and full as the testimony before the committee; at least it has never been customary to make them so. No member of that committee can, out of the thousand bills before it in any one Congress, remember all the detailed facts of each case.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand that; that is true often, and it is generally the rule that they do not know the facts of the case after it comes up here, after they get cold. But you come in here and ask us to pass a bill, and yet now, on the very second case mentioned here, you are not able to give a legal reason for the legislation that you are asking the House for. Is there any other gentleman on this committee that can give us the information? It seems that no one knows anything about it.

Then I will pass to the third case:

H. R. 2078. Louisa Pitts, aged 69 years, is the widow of Jacob Pitts, who served as a private in Company D, One hundred and thirteenth Regiment Ohio Infantry, from October 20, 1862, to July 6, 1865 (2 years and 8½ months). Address, Johnstown, Mo.

Soldier never applied for pension; he died March 28, 1880. He and pensioner were married November 13, 1859, and she has been pensioned under the general law at $8 from the date of his death, and at $12 from March 19, 1886.

Dr. J. M. Miller certifies pensioner suffers from chronic cystitis and cancer of the nose, and is 69 years old and is unable to earn a livelihood.

Applicant and two neighbors testify that she owns a house and lot of the value of $100; no other property and no income but her pension.

As she is a war widow, is old and poor, and unable to work, an increase to $20 is justified.

I am going to say to the gentleman from Missouri that if he does not know that that is right, I do. I commend his committee for that; it is a good pension bill and ought to pass.

I will call up another one, H. R. 2118:

H. R. 2118. Jeshuron Bailey, aged 65 years, served as a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, from August 20, 1864, to June 2, 1865 (9 months and 12 days), and is now a pensioner under the act of February 6, 1907, at $12 per month on account of age. Address, 1935 Mormon Coulee Road, La Crosse, Wis.

No report from a board of surgeons. Medical testimony is that applicant has neuralgia of head and heart, water in the scrotum, hydrocele, chronic kidney trouble, and compound fracture of the right ankle, and is totally unable to do manual labor. Other testimony is that applicant has no property and no means of support but his pension.

An increase to $24 a month is recommended.

I do not know what diseases that man has, but if my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] says he has got them, I am willing to pass this one.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not one of the witnesses in the case.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is no proof here that he had them. I will pass over that case to the next one—H. R. 2363:

H. R. 2363. Solomon Barr, 67 years of age, served as a private in Company K, Two hundred and thirteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, from February 22, 1865, to November 18, 1865, and is a pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 on account of rheumatism and disease of the heart.

He was formerly pensioned under the general law at $6 on account of rheumatism.

He was last examined 20 years ago by the Allentown (Pa.) board of surgeons, and was then rated $8 for rheumatism affecting both knee joints and shoulder joints, and $4 for valvular disease of the heart.

He is a resident of South Bethlehem, Pa., and according to the testimony of Dr. Yost, of that place, is now suffering from inflammatory rheumatism in a chronic form, which had taken a firm hold on the upper and lower extremities, weakness of the right lung with chronic capillary trouble of the same lung, hemorrhoids and general debility, and to be entirely disabled for doing any manual labor of any kind.

The soldier owns no property and has no means of support aside from his pension.

Some measure of relief, to aid in his support, is justified by the facts set forth, and an increase of his pension to $24 per month is recommended.

What is the reason you did not get proof about these matters since 20 years ago except the statement of one physician? It looks to me like a very bad policy, if a man has lived 20 years under disabilities, to grant him a pension without the proof of a late date as to his physical condition. I suppose it does not make any difference whether he has been sick 20 years or 40 years; if it is the right place for a pension he should get it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The reference to 20 years ago was when he was last examined by the pension board. The report shows that he was a resident of South Bethlehem, Pa., and according to the testimony of Dr. Yost—that date is not given, but I feel safe in saying that it was within the last 12 months. The secretary of the committee says that this was recent testimony.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then we have this case: A man has not been examined for a pension for 20 years and a pension is granted, and the chairman of the committee justifies it alone upon the meager belief that possibly within 12 months last there was some proof that justified such action. Ought the House to act on that sort of testimony?

Take the next case, H. R. 2680:

H. R. 2680. Elizabeth M. Rutherford, aged 67 years, is the widow of George Rutherford, who served as a sergeant in Company F, Second Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, from July 3, 1861, to June 21, 1865 (3 years 11½ months). Address, 2505 Buchanan Street NE., Minneapolis, Minn.

Soldier was pensioned at $24 a month under the general law for gunshot wound of left arm. He died July 3, 1895. Soldier and pensioner were married March 24, 1867. Her application under the general law was rejected December 13, 1900, on the ground that soldier's fatal disease of heart was not shown to be of service origin. However, she is pensioned under act of June 27, 1890, as amended, at $8 from August 15, 1895, and $2 for minor child, and at $12 from April 19, 1908. A special act granting her $12 from May 13, 1908, was passed, but she elected to remain on the rolls under act of June 27, 1890.

Dr. H. M. Guilford has treated pensioner for 12 years. She suffers from stomach trouble, indigestion, nervousness, and some tuberculosis of the lungs, and is not capable of earning her support in any way.

She owns 18 lots in northeast Minneapolis, worth about $4,500, mortgaged at $1,800, bearing 6 per cent interest; taxes, $133.20. She also owns a homestead in Custer County, worth $600, and is in debt for improvements thereon to the full value of the homestead. She is unable to sell the lots or homestead and derives no income therefrom. She has no personal effects of value and no support or income from any source other than her pension. This condition of affairs is shown by her own testimony and of two reputable acquaintances.

An increase to $20 a month is recommended.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDS. I think, in justice to the committee, that the gentleman from Tennessee should read the report correctly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Why, what have I left out?

Mr. FIELDS. On page 7, in the fourth line of the third paragraph, the gentleman left out the words "for improvements thereon to the full value of the homestead."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I surely read that.

Mr. FIELDS. Oh, I have noticed all along that the gentleman has not read the report in full.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has not noticed any such thing. He is mistaken. I did read it.

Mr. FIELDS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman will just take his seat. I have the floor. I say this statement is incorrect. I never misstated anything about anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Here is a case where a woman is worth $4,500 in lots in Minneapolis, a large, growing city, and worth $600 in a homestead in Custer County, and the pretext they offer for the increase of this pension is that you can not sell lots worth $4,500 in Minneapolis and land worth $600 in Custer County. Wherever a pensioner has an income, a pension is not granted as a rule. Where they have at least $300 income, they do not grant pensions as a rule. There is property that is worth fifty-odd hundred dollars. If it were sold for what they say it is worth, that money could be put out at interest and bring in an income of more than $300 per annum, even at 6 per cent. I am not objecting to this lady getting that pension. I do not care anything about that. I am just showing that they do not know what they are doing, that they have brought a bill here about which they do not know anything, that they are violating the law and the precedents of this House in presenting measures of that sort and attempting to pass them.

The idea of bringing here a bill where a woman is worth $5,000 and is already drawing a pension of $12 and asking for an increase of that to $20, and for what? Because there is not a good sale for fine lots in Minneapolis! What a reason for a sensible committee to offer! Mr. Chairman, I am not censuring the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], because he concedes that he knows but little about these matters, and I have called all over this House for those men on the committee to tell me what they know about it, and there is not a man who knows anything about it. Our common sense teaches us that that sort of a bill ought not to pass. I have just been reading these cases at random. I never read one of them before in my life, and that is the way they appear in this bill. If the bill is that way all the way through, you ought to kick it out of the House without letting it get by the Speaker's desk, even.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not yield right now. I have some more for the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to find one that I would agree to pass. I did find one awhile ago, and I thought it ought to pass, but the gentleman hesitated about that a little bit. He knew the others were too bad.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair as he goes along.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If I did not want to be fair I would stop. But I will stop now and be fair by letting you talk for a minute.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman says that the report shows that this widow is worth $5,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I did not say that. I stated that the report showed that she owns 18 lots in northeast Minneapolis, worth about $4,500, and mortgaged for $1,800, bearing 6 per cent interest. Then, she owns a homestead in Custer County worth $600. The $600 and the $4,500 make about $5,100, with that mortgage on it, and if you can realize $5,100 for it I will take the money and give you good security at 7 per cent.

Mr. RUSSELL. But, if I am not mistaken, in a general way the gentleman stated that this lady was shown to be worth $5,000. The total sum was $5,100, with a mortgage, which left $3,300.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. That makes quite a difference. And, then, the report also states that she has no income whatever on this property.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Now, is the gentleman prepared to say about this, that he is going to pension every widow and soldier in these United States beyond $12 who can show up $3,300 in assets? I am taking the gentleman's own figures.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have voted against many of these items in the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Take the gentleman's own figures—or call it $3,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not always vote for those items in the committee. I am not the entire committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know the gentleman is not the entire committee. There seems to be no entire committee, because nobody seems to know anything about it. You have here a lot of stuff in this House and you can not account for presenting it here, not a bit of it. I am going to find one that is good, that I may relieve the gentleman from his dilemma. I am tired of putting the hard ones up to him. I will next take up the bill H. R. 2706:

Torger Hanson, aged 65 years, served as a private in Company G, Fifth Regiment Minnesota Infantry, from August 15, 1864, to May 24, 1865 (9 months), and is now a pensioner under the act of February 6, 1907, at $12 per month, on account of age. Formerly pensioned under act of June 27, 1890, at $8, for impaired use of right arm and lame back. Address: 3755 Snelling Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Medical examination, March 1, 1905, shows pensioned causes catarrh and an old fracture of eighth rib.

Dr. T. R. Woodard declares that right arm shows evidence of burns, which impairs the use of the arm; that he has rheumatism, and is a broken-down old man, which is substantiated by Dr. R. R. Knight, who adds that the soldier has chronic bronchitis and mitral insufficiency, and is unable to do much manual labor.

Lay testimony shows that he has a home worth $800, mortgaged at $200, and has less than $100 of personal property. His wife is affected bodily and mentally and can not aid in his support, and besides his pension has no other means of support.

An increase to $24 is recommended.

There is the case of a poor old man, and I am mighty glad that you have given him his pension. That is an honest statement.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman indorsed another one a little while ago.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; that was pretty good, but this is a better one. I am going to give the gentleman credit for everything that he has done; but I have read seven or eight of these, and out of the eight there are two that I commend myself, and the gentleman commends them also, while the other six show that they are bad on their face and you can not defend them, and you have not done it, and there is nobody else, though called upon, who is able to do so.

I will now pass over to page 12 and take up one at random there and see what it is:

H. R. 5858. James W. Cannon, aged 63 years, served as a private in Company G, Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, from September 1, 1864, to September 20, 1865 (1 year), and is now a pensioner under the act of July 14, 1862, at $17 per month, on account of rheumatism and resulting disease of heart and disease of eyes. Address, Bowling Green, Ky.

Medical examination, March 21, 1910, rates pensioner $30 for his pensioned disabilities, but the Bureau of Pensions denied an increase on said examination.

Dr. W. R. Francis, April 16, 1912, his physician, states he is now a total invalid, due to heart disease in an aggravated form, partial paralysis of left side, hip-joint disease, and arteriosclerosis. This is corroborated by Dr. J. F. Duncan.

Neighbors testify that pensioner owns no property of any kind, and his means of support is his pension.

An increase to $30 is recommended.

What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. RUSSELL. That seems to be a good case.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think it is a very fair case.

Mr. THOMAS. You think it is a fair case?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. And you have not the slightest objection to it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have not. I want all these good pensions passed.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to say that I can defend all the pensioners that I have in this bill or any other bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You can defend anything by your right.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; and I will always be on hand ready to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is right. I notice the gentleman did not have much to say about it until he heard it stated that it was a good case.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not have any other kind.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Here is another case:

H. R. 12652. James K. Waltermire, aged 77 years, served as a private in Company I, Third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, from April 25, 1861, to August 22, 1861 (3 months 27 days), and was formerly a pensioner under the act of February 6, 1907, at $15 per month on account of age. Address, Scipio, Route No. 2, Ind.

He was formerly pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 per month by reason of disease of chest and senile debility.

Board of surgeons, March 4, 1903, found asthma, emphysema, and heart disease.

Medical testimony is that applicant has enlargement of the heart and is totally disabled. He is growing worse.

It appears that the applicant has no property.

While the applicant was dropped from the rolls by the Bureau of Pensions because, as it was claimed, his service—actual military service—was less than 90 days, it appears from the applicant's sworn statement and from other sworn statements that he was engaged in active recruiting service under the direction of a Capt. Rose after he returned from the front, and so continued in such active recruiting service until he was honorably mustered out.

In view of the facts, peculiar to this case, it is recommended that the applicant be placed on the roll of pensioners at $20 per month.

Well, now, what is the peculiar fact that justifies that violation of the 90-day law?

Mr. RUSSELL. His helpless condition and no property.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then, it is conceded that the general statute that requires a service of 90 days' enlistment is violated and the relief is given on the ground that the soldier has no means and is a cripple? I understand that is the reason why you give the relief?

Mr. RUSSELL. He was in the recruiting service. He was out of the regular service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand; but that is not the 90 days required under the law.

I have no serious censure to make of the action of the committee in stretching the law a little if it be so expanded that you can justify under the real facts the necessities of the case, because a power exists with Congress, outside of that general law in a specific case, to grant the relief anyway. But I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think it a bad idea, when the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Regiments of the United States are now prohibited by law and by the action of the department, although they served more than a year in the service of the United States, were regularly enlisted and honorably discharged, and are now denied pensions under the ruling of the department, and when there was some sort of an agreement that a pension would not be asked for the reason they were not participating directly in the suppression of the rebellion, being in frontier service—that that hard rule should be adhered to by your committee as to 6,000 soldiers in the United States and has to be invoked on the subject of muster in and muster out and honorable discharges to the soldiers as to the 90-day service of those men who are denied that right under the law to-day? How do you justify and ride over that statute and make a special example in the interest of one man? Why did you not provide, if you are going to do anything for the soldiers in a general way, by a general law that would give these six regiments of the United States a right to participate in the general pension fund in the general law? Why did you not provide for these men generally who did not serve the 90 days in the Regular Army and yet performed more than 90 days' service in recruiting, driving wagons, and other work, practically civilian in its character—why did you not give them in the general law the benefits that you single out for one man? I am not objecting to this poor man having it. We have the power, and we ought to exercise it wisely and justly, and, although the general law would not embrace him within its operation, I have no objection to this man or any other similarly unfortunately situated having the benefit of the law. But in the discharge of your duty why do you select one man and leave out these hosts of more than equally worthy men from the benefit of the bounty of the Government?

Mr RUSSELL. There has been no such bill before our committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know; but it is your place to make bills.

Very well. Here is the case of Harriet Downs, the widow of Edward S. Downs, who served as a private in Company F, Sixth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. Now comes my friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], I reckon.

Mr. RUSSELL. What page is that?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is on page 23. He died September 10, 1880, without ever having applied for a pension. He was a good, straight, honest man, who stood for his country and did not want any pension. The report further says:

Claimant, who married the soldier on March 20, 1867, has been a pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, ever since August 20, 1890, and is now receiving the rate of $12 per month provided by the first section of the act of April 19, 1908.

She resides at 27 Chamberlain Street, New Haven, Conn., and Dr. E. J. Walker testifies that she is not physically helpless, but that owing to her years and to the effects of lagrippe can not earn a living.

Neighbors testify she has no property, but earns $1.50 a week by baking; has no income but her pension of $12 a month.

Giving due consideration to soldier's long service, her years, and destitution, an increase to $20 a month is proper.

What have you to say about that?

Mr. RUSSELL. I only know what the report states. I do not remember the details of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is that all there is of the report?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is all there is of the report. You understand that a report here can not contain all the evidence. It never does.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am not going to criticize you about that. I think that is all right, too. Well, we will refer to another one. You have three out of ten.

Mr. RUSSELL. You would agree to all of them if you had the evidence before you. I want to say in that connection that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] knows very well that this House can not get all the evidence in each of these cases and consider each case. You have got to trust some to your committee, as you trust other things to the committees of this House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am fully aware of the fact that the gentleman is correct in that statement, but this House certainly ought to be able to depend upon somebody in that committee, some member of it, when called upon to furnish these facts. I know you can not present all the facts in detail in each and every case, but the gentleman must recollect that he has not been able to give me facts in a single case where it has been disputed and where the records on the facts show a legal condition or one that is obtainable in point of fact. I am not blaming the gentleman because he is chairman of the committee. I am taking these things at random and at what they are worth when we come to them, and the gentleman has not been able yet, and he says he can not, and the balance of the committee say they can not, tell us whether these matters ought to pass or not, legally and wisely.

My attention is called by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], in this same report, to a case on page 78, and I am going to read it. It is H. R. 26364. The report says:

Frances M. Rounds is the widow of Henry Rounds, who served as a sergeant in Company B, Third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, from July 16, 1863, to August 4, 1865 (2 years).

Soldier was pensioned under act of June 27, 1890, at $10 a month by reason of chronic rheumatism, disease of heart, and obesity. His claim under the general law was rejected March 9, 1886, on the ground of no pensionable disability. He died September 6, 1905, and his widow was pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at $8 a month from September 18, 1905. She was married to the soldier May 31, 1890; was his third wife. His first wife, the mother of the claimant, died January 1, 1880, when she was about 1 year old. Soldier was divorced from his second wife May 12, 1890.

Inasmuch as Pearl Rounds was over 16 at the date of soldier's death she was not entitled to any rate under existing law.

Dr. Edward Remy gives the following history of the case: The father of Pearl Rounds died in 1906; mother died of pulmonary tuberculosis when Miss Rounds was but 8 months of age. There are three brothers and one sister, all living, and as far as known all are in good health.

Now I will read the "personal history." It seems to be quite a long one, but I would just as soon read this as any of them. I read:

Personal history: After the death of the mother, Miss Rounds, being the youngest in the family, was cared for by her brothers and sister, who being still quite young, were unable to give her the proper attention. At about 1 year of age she was taken by Mrs. John Bergdoerfer and, although was never adopted, she has ever since made her home with Mrs. Bergdoerfer. The latter reports that while Miss Rounds was still under the care of her brothers and sister, she had repeated falls; at one time from a table and others being caused by the overturning of a chair; each time producing more or less injury to the back. About one year after coming under the care of Mrs. Bergdoerfer she noticed the child having a grunting respiration and, in beginning to walk, supported herself with her right hand upon her right knee and with the left hand upon the back. Some bulging of the spine about the middle of the back was noticed at this time. At about 8 years of age the spine became tender and with abscess formation. Miss Rounds claims that she has not grown in height since about 14 years of age; the prominence of the back steadily increasing until about 20 years of age. She claims to have been operated upon by Dr. H. F. Biggar, of Cleveland, Ohio, when 23 years of age. The nature of the operation is not positively known by the patient, but was performed on the left side of the back, and the diagnosis at that time, according to her own statement, was "tuberculosis of the bone."

Physical examination: She is of small stature, being 4 feet 11 inches tall; not very well nourished; weight, 66 pounds.

Did you pension her?

Mr. RUSSELL. This is Gen. SHERWOOD's case; the case of Gen. SHERWOOD, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This is an exceedingly long and interesting report. I was curious to know if the pension was recommended to be given on the facts.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Committee on Pensions was divided into subcommittees.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will skip just a section or two of the proof here about the heart, lungs, and abdominal trouble. Now I read:

It is proposed by this bill to increase the pension of the widow who has been appointed guardian of the helpless child, Pearl Rounds, now 33 years old, to $24 a month, in order that the child may receive proper care and support.

Mr. John Bergdoerfer having died and left his wife without means of support, and the child, Pearl Rounds, having none, it is proper that the soldier's helpless child be provided with means sufficient for her care; therefore, it is recommended that the widow's pension be increased to $24 a month; provided, that in the event of the death of Pearl Rounds, the additional pension granted to the widow shall cease and determine; and provided further, that in the event of the death of Frances M. Rounds the name of said Pearl Rounds shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the death of said Frances M. Rounds.

Now, tell me what right you have to do that under the law? The law provides that you shall not give pensions to children of soldiers if the children are over 16 years of age. There is no exception to the law on that subject, and you try to circumvent the law on that question by giving the pension to the widow, and then you provide that if the child dies, that poor old widow shall not have a pension, and then you provide that if the widow dies the pension shall accrue to the child, attempting to pension both ways.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman overlooks the provision in the pension law that a permanently helpless child is pensionable regardless of its age.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I am not overlooking that provision at all. You have a double-acting pension here. You attempt to pension the widow in the first place; that is what you do. You do not pension the child at all, and in the next place you provide that when the widow dies the child shall inherit the pension.

Has it come in this country to the point where Congress is going to grant pensions inheritable between mother and child, and father and son?

Now, that is just driving the question a little too far. You have no justification in the law for such a thing. Of course you may contend that Congress has the power to do it. Who doubts the plenary power of this body? You may contend that the Congress has the power to give away the Treasury for any purpose it sees fit, for anything it wants to give it for. The Constitution lays no bounds on this body. All you have to do is to exercise your general legislative discretion, and that is the end of it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MURRAY). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the point of order is not material to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Chair will put the motion that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MURRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27475) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war and had come to no resolution thereon.

PORTO RICO (H. DOC. NO. 1256).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanaying documents, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 32 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the Executive Council of Porto Rico, which are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me. Such of these as relate to railroad, street railway, telegraph, and telephone franchises, privileges, or concessions have been approved by me, as required by the joint resolution of May 1, 1900 (31 Stat., 715).

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1913.

SAMOAN CLAIMS (H. DOC. NO. 1257).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State of the action taken by him in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 23, 1910, authorizing and directing him to ascertain the "amounts due, if any, respectively, to American citizens on claims heretofore filed in the Department of State growing out of the joint naval operations of the United States and Great Britain in and about the town of Apia, in the Samoan Islands, in the months of March, April, and May, 1899 * * * and report the same to Congress."

Accompanying the report of the Secretary of State is the report of the officer who, pursuant to the Secretary's direction, visited the Samoan Islands for the purpose of collecting evidence regarding the claims mentioned. Of the total amount of American claims of about $64,677.88, payment of $14,811.42 is recommended by the agent. This finding is approved by the Secretary of State, who submits for the consideration of Congress the question of an immediate appropriation for the payment of the claims recommended.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1913.

The SPEAKER. This message, with the accompanying documents, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is not that a matter which should properly be referred to the Committee on Claims? It recommends the payment of a number of claims. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has no jurisdiction over that.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents will be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the pension bill, H. R. 27475, and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that, and I hope I may be indulged just a moment for the purpose of giving reasons which I think are reasonable and tenable. Here are 217 bills included in this one omnibus bill. The report is 90 pages in length. In the discussion in Committee of the Whole, which has just occurred, 10 of these cases were picked out at random and read, and only 3 of them were in such shape that any member of this committee could give an intelligent reason why they should pass. The others were so bad, so thoroughly rotten, that I believe this House would do itself great injustice not to take the time in general debate for their discussion, and in the five-minute debate—and some of them can not be disposed of probably in that time—in order that the country may know that this bill has not had consideration by the committee or anybody else, and that it ought not to pass. I object.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Before the gentleman objects, will he reserve his objection for a moment?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. This whole business is proceeding by unanimous consent, and the regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the general debate upon this bill close in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the general debate on this bill close in 10 minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that general debate close in two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] offers an amendment, that general debate close in two hours.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, when this discussion began I understood that this was pension day. We have pending before the House the report of the Pensions Committee, embracing 23 bills, I believe. And if there is to be a discussion of cases reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it seems to me that our bill from the Pensions Committee ought not to be longer delayed, but that it ought to be considered.

The SPEAKER. This bill that is under consideration is a pension bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee can make the criticism of the Pensions Committee that he has made of the Invalid Pensions Committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Neither do I. I think you are a better set of men.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is pension day, and there is no division between us. Let us go on now and consider the Pensions Committee cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states to the gentleman from Alabama that the bill now under consideration is a pension bill, and it is not possible to consider two pension bills at one time. The bill under consideration was called first, and its consideration is in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Pensions Committee are not afraid of the criticisms of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary controversy. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] for two hours' general debate on this bill.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 8, noes 69.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory at this time in the afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not prepared to rule that that motion is dilatory.

Mr. MANN. The Chair ruled that it was when I made it.

The SPEAKER. That was under different circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. This is under worse circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will try to give you all fair consideration, anyway. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn. A quorum not being present, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, those in favor of the Roddenbery amendment to close debate in two hours will answer aye, those opposed no, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 40, nays 152, answered "present" 7, not voting 185, as follows:

Commencing January 10:

Mr. CARTER with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SCULLY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BROWNING. Then I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to close general debate in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 110, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27475—the pension bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. MURRAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideratoin of the bill H. R. 27475. General debate has been limited to 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, is there anybody on that side of the House opposed to the bill that desires five minutes?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I would like five minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Before taking the five minutes I desire to yield to anyone who may desire to oppose the bill. Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat remarkable that a distinguished Member of this House, in general debate when the pension bill is being considered, arises in his place and takes the report of the committee in conjunction with the bill, discusses the germane elements of the report and the bill, and that throughout an hour's discussion, with one exception, the author of not a single bill would rise to explain to the House of Representatives what the merits of his proposals were. It is a unique period in the history of legislation in a republican government when the author of a bill and no member of the committee should rise to give to a distinguished Member an explanation of why the Treasury of the people of the country should be charged with the expenditure of their tax money. We see during Judge MOON'S remarks where he discloses infirmities of legislation and asked for an explanation that there was none. When he had concluded and other Members sought to be recognized to discuss the legislation the chairman of the committee moved that the committee rise, and forthwith moved that general debate be limited to 30 minutes. Thirty minutes, and now 10 minutes, in which to discuss 237 items, every one of them charging your constituents and mine with the levy of Federal taxation.

The record of this day's proceedings will disclose that Members on the roll call voted to suppress discussion to prevent exposure of fraud and reward the deserters and traitors to the country, thus putting on the taxpayers of this country added thousands of dollars.

Gentlemen, are you afraid of the bill? Gentlemen, do you not dare to discuss the merits of the proposition by which you seek to take money from the pockets of the people? Has the old soldier of this age, with two hundred millions of appropriations for his pensions now confronting us, has the old soldier's cause reached the stage when his supporters on the floor will not defend the merits of his claims? The old soldiers of this country will indorse no such methods, no such practices. Every soldier of the Union in this bill, or his widow, want their rights considered by the House. Every deserter, every wealthy person, every fraudulent impostor on the people will applaud the vote that stifles debate and denies discussion. It is the history of legislation that when the people stand face to face with exposure that he who seeks to profit by the surreptitious legislation will applaud every effort to deny the people full discussion of the truth. I wonder now if the gentlemen, under the five-minute rule, propose to prevent the discussion of these bills. We will see in just a few minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, if no one desires to speak in favor of the bill, the Clerk may read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri yields back his time. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of William Andrews, late of Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri does not desire to say anything in support of the bill, I would like a moment. I have always favored proper and legitimate pensions of all soldiers of the United States. I favored the private bills wherever they were just and fair. I have favored the general laws in their behalf and the general appropriations in their behalf. I do not know that upon a proper explanation of the facts in the case there is a single bill reported here on the measure under consideration to which I would have any opposition. But it was disclosed in general debate that the committee were unable in at least 8 out of 10 cases that were referred to—merely at random and for the first time, not having been selected for the purpose of reference—to give an intelligent explanation of the reasons why they asked the appropriation in each of these cases. This is an omnibus bill. Evidently there are bad bills and there are good bills. It would be an exceptional thing if there were not bad bills. If we want to legislate honestly in the interest of the soldiers of the country—and I am sure there is no soldier who wants an improper bill passed—I feel it is our duty to know the facts. We are entitled to know from this committee the facts and the reasons why they make the recommendations for appropriations in each and every one of these bills. As I said before, I have no reason for objecting to this bill—to the first one, or to any of the others—but I feel it is due to the House that substantial and honest reasons may be given for this legislation, that we may justify ourselves in its enactment. Here is a measure carrying several bills. The first bill is reported on facts that are meagerly stated, and upon their face they hardly justify an appropriation, and yet a full disclosure of the facts may show that this is a proper bill for passage. I offer no opposition to the bill, but I do insist that the report of the committee on this bill be read, and that the chairman of this committee give an explanation, if he can, why he asks for this legislation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the gentleman from Tennessee is sincere in asking me as acting chairman of this committee to-day to explain this item in this bill. I want to state, and he knows he has already in the discussion of the bill said that he knows that that is true, that no member of this committee can be acquainted with all the testimony offered in support of an item like this.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman concedes that he is not able to give a full statement of these facts, would it not be well for some member of the committee or some one interested in this particular bill to make a statement to the House as to what all the facts are in justification of this enactment? At least, would it not be well that the House hear the report upon that bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY]. I presume if he were here he might be able to give all of the facts in the case, but it happens to-day that he is not present.

Mr. COX. He is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is now in session.

Mr. RUSSELL. He is away attending to his official duties.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If there is nobody here who knows the facts, if no one can state an intelligent reason for the passage of this bill, why should the committee ask the House to approve this legislation?

Mr. RUSSELL. Simply for the reason that this House in every case does trust and ought to trust the committees. It has to trust the committees that have to do the work. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course. Of course you are obliged to trust the committee. We trust the committee, however, upon the presumption that the committee knows the facts, and we blindly follow the committee even along these lines, but when a question is raised and it is clearly disclosed that the committee does not know the facts, does not common sense dictate that we ought not to legislate until we do know the facts?

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Tennessee has already admitted to-day in the discussion here that he knows that it is absolutely impossible and not expected that a member of this committee will be able to state all the details of the evidence in these cases.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then would not the gentleman have the report read?

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe that if this report were read here from the Clerk's desk the membership of this House would give attention to it while it was being read?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course. Here is a bill pending, and there is a short report upon this particular bill, ought not this House to know at least that much about it?

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to say that we have been passing these pension bills ever since I have been in Congress. We have passed a great many bills coming from this committee offered by the gentleman from Tennessee himself, and he never before asked for a report to be read. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. And he never before took the position that he is taking to-day, although he has served years and years in this House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that is not the fact. The exact opposite of that is true. The gentleman from Tennessee on various occasions has defended the measures that he has had here when they have been assailed. He never does defend them unless they are assailed.

Mr. LANGLEY. Did the gentleman ever before ask for the reading of these reports in each case as he is doing now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has not only had the reports read, but the gentleman on one occasion stood here for four hours and defended a bill in favor of a pension.

Mr. LANGLEY. I expect that the gentleman may have presented a bill here at some time the merits of which were such as to require four hours of defense.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And it went through by a vote of 300 to 1. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri to tell us what he knows about that bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not recall the testimony on this item when it was offered before the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Is there anybody here who does?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] is not here. Perhaps if he were here he might be able to explain items in that bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Have you not the report?

Mr. RUSSELL. Here is the report, and the affidavits are on file, and they can be procured and brought here.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not want to be unreasonable, but I will ask the gentleman to report what he has there.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the gentleman believe that this House wants to set aside the report of the committee and its work and its honest judgment and bring all of the affidavits here in these 237 cases that have been passed by the House? [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No, indeed.

Mr. RUSSELL. If you can not trust this committee as you trust other committees in the House, then the legislation can not be enacted at all, and that seems to be the result of the filibuster.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has made a report in this case.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; here is the report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Read it and let the House know its contents.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman has already read the report to the House. You have to trust the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am willing to trust this committee, but not to trust it blindly when the committee says it does not know anything about its work. I can not trust it in that event.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The chairman of this committee says the committee should be trusted. Now, this committee has been trusted, and let me show you what they have done with that trust. The laws of the United States provided that when this man entered he could not enter under 18 years of age. At the time William Andrews entered the service he enlisted at 13 years of age. In the first place, does anybody in this House believe he saw service at all? Soldier boy—13 years of age baby pension! [Laughter.] Now, they come here, Mr. Chairman, and propose to put on this roll of pensioners a boy 13 years of age, who was a deserter, as stated in the committee's own report now before this House. You do not have to have a full report like the gentleman from Tennessee is calling for. Take this report. It is sufficient to expose, before this House and the country, pension methods. I say the boy was a deserter. That alone should have ended this claim, and the committee should have kicked it out the door. This claim was refused by the Bureau of Pensions. When the doctors examined him for the Pension Bureau he claimed to have at that time lumbago, disease of heart, and bronchitis. The Bureau of Pensions turned him down, and said he did not have any such diseases. He went out there to Defiance, Ohio, and picked up another doctor by the name of Dr. Ury. This Dr. Ury credits him with about 10 other diseases, and does not mention any one of the three diseases the applicant claimed in first examination to have. And yet you talk about being trusted. The Pension Bureau, schooled to pass all kinds of claims, would not stand for baby soldier, deserter, and man who transferred his lumbago, heart disease, and bronchitis for numerous other diseases. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Emma L. Cole, widow of William C. Cole, acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report of the committee in this case be read for the information of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. I object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We have a right to have it read in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Not without a motion. The Chair will, however, construe the request as a motion to have the report read.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Under the rule, as I understand it, we have the right to have this report, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the Chair has a right to rule on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the rule is very clear. Rule XXX, page 404, is as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded and the same is objected to by any Member, it shall be determined without debate by vote of the House.

There has been objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Here is a paper that the House has determined.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit to the Chair that the House does not determine a vote upon the report of the committee, but upon the bill itself.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course——

Mr. FOSTER. And the gentleman's statement is erroneous, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I insist that the House has a right to hear the report of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no disagreement between the gentleman and the Chair on that point, but the committee has a right to say whether it will hear the report read or not. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], that the report of the committee be read.

The question was taken, and the Chairman reported that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 14, noes 87.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I remarked before, I do not know that there is any special objection which I have to a number of these bills, but I shall in my own time on the floor read as follows as part of my remarks in this case:

H. R. 111. Emma L. Cole, about 61 years of age, is the widow of William C. Cole, who served as acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, from August 21, 1863, to October 5, 1863, and from October 31, 1863, to December 17, 1864, and who died December 29, 1902, of paralysis, while a pensioner under the general law at $30 per month on account of an injury to the lower jaw and back received in line of duty in September, 1864.

The claimant, who married the surgeon on January 3, 1870, sought pension under the general law, but her claim was properly rejected in July, 1908, upon the ground that her husband's fatal paralysis had no connection with the disabilities for which he was pensioned and was not otherwise shown to have been due to his military service.

She also sought pension under the act of June 27, 1890, but this claim was likewise rejected on the ground that her husband was neither an enlisted man nor a commissioned officer in the military establishment.

Claimant is a resident of Van Wert, Ohio, and is shown by proof filed with your committee to have no property and to be dependent upon her own labor for a support.

Congress having repeatedly granted relief to the men who served as contract surgeons and to the widows of such persons, like relief is believed to be warranted in this case, and a pension of $12 per month is therefore recommended.

Now, there is not a soldier nor a commissioned officer in the Army whose widow is receiving a pension under this bill. Under the general law pensions must be granted alone to enlisted soldiers or the widows of enlisted soldiers. Now, I am about the last person in the world who would want to deny a pension to a worthy person, but here is practically the granting of a civil pension. It is not a pension to a soldier nor to a commissioned officer of the Army, but it is to one who occupied no military psition, no enlisted position of any kind, and surely the law will be overridden in a case like this. If you can grant pensions to persons occupying a situation like this, then you might subvert the law in another instance and grant them to widows who married since the act of 1869, and also grant them to a widow of a soldier who served less than 90 days. Let us give fair, legitimate, and honest pensions to the soldiers and widows of soldiers, but not to those who were not soldiers. And the argument that Congress may have violated the principles of the law heretofore—it might have gone further than it ought to have gone—is no justification for it now, however far it may have gone in the past. I do not want to offer any serious objection to a pension, but in all common decency this Congress ought to show some special reason for the passage of this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] wants to know why this widow is granted a pension, stating that her husband was not a soldier. This report—although he criticizes our report—shows that her husband was a surgeon in the Army.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. He was not a soldier and enlisted.

Mr. RUSSELL. But he was a surgeon, and under the general law was pensioned at $30 a month. Now, then, are you opposed to the pension law of the country under which he was pensioned; and if he was given a pension under the general law, why should his widow, who married him forty and odd years ago, be denied a pension when she is shown to be deserving in every other way?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Your own statement shows here that her pension was denied under the general law.

Mr. RUSSELL. But he was pensioned at $30 a month under the general law. Of course, if we are not to give pensions to anyone who can not get them in the department, you have no use for an Invalid Pension Committee to represent you in the House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has at last given a satisfactory reason, perhaps, in law. I offer no objection to the pension, but you have got to show why you want these laws passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. The reason I have given is printed here in that report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Why did you not want the report read?

Mr. RUSSELL. I know the gentleman did read it, but I still insist that he gave no reason why the pension should be granted. Now, after I have read it, the gentleman sees that it does give reasons.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I say that the gentleman has made an explanation of it that is more satisfactory than it was before. The report shows it.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it is a notorious fact that I am unalterably opposed to any species of monopoly, and that intense opposition embraces in its beneficent breadth legislative as well as commercial monopoly. Indeed, sir, when we pause to reflect upon the import of these two closely allied monopolies, it is difficult at times to determine which of the two is the more serious menace in our political and economic affairs, there being frequently a similarity of result in the exercise of either. We have restraint of trade on the one side and restraint of speech on the other, and just as some promising infant industry, from the standpoint of commerce, only too frequently feels the relentless and murderous hand of monopoly at its very vitals, just so some promising, and what might develop into a product of effective, utterance may, in the exigencies of parliamentary procedure, be strangled at its very birth. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that my effort now will meet with no such untoward fate, for I rise to the assistance of the criticizers of this measure. I can not silently assent to the selfish desire of three very distinguished Members of this House to appropriate to themselves all of the deserving criticism that is to be leveled against it. [Laughter.]

It has been truly said that "Competition is the life of trade," and similarly it can be as truthfully said that competition means sometimes the life of legislators, and I may pause to suggest that this improvised axiom seems rather reminiscent of my late political experience. [Laughter.] Still let me now, while I may, enlist as a contemporaneous competitive critic of the action of the committee. Indeed, let me go further and be, in the modern acceptation of the term, a true "progressive" in the race of criticism; and we all know what that means, even though I may not hope to cope with some of the leaders of the "progressives" in appropriate adjectives. I would outstrip my friends the criticizers. They are at best but novices in the art. While their lances are keen, they have but skinned the bark; they have by no means penetrated to the heart of the subject.

Mr. Chairman, during my service in this body the proud distinction has, at unfortunately rare intervals, been mine to temporarily preside over its sometimes heated deliberations, if I may so express it; and, like an ambitious student of parliamentary tactics, I have carefully noted from that exalted position the methods of those who have been unjustly denominated "filibusterers." Mr. Chairman, that is an unmerited reflection upon a class of gentlemen who should be dignified by the designation "legislative critics" [laughter], whose salutary presence is indispensable to the intelligent and effective performance of our duties as legislators. Criticism by way of nonparticipation in vicious legislation has had a very wholesome effect in our legislative history, while those who indulge in this species of criticism are unthinkingly regarded by some as obstructionists. That is eminently unfair.

I charge this committee with recreancy of duty in that it has, with some unrevealed and mysterious motive, withheld from this House the evidence, underlying its surreptitious attempt to insinuate its grim, grimy hand into the sacred bowels of the Treasury and withdraw the sum of $20 per month as a pension for the widow of one "Joseph Jefferson." As Marcus Tullius Cicero said, pointing his condemning finger at Mark Antony, "Romans, he is agitated; he perspires; he turns pale"—so will I presently call upon you, my colleagues, when I have further exposed this daring raid upon the Treasury, to turn your attention in the direction where my finger is pointing and behold what is equivalent to a confession—the blanched face and trembling lips of the chairman of this committee. [Laughter.]

But in the profound utterance of the immortal Dane—

Brief let me be.

My distinguished friends have addressed themselves with characteristic pointedness and eloquent persuasiveness to many paragraphs of this bill. Mr. Chairman, theirs were appropriate and relevant suggestions, and I here and now eagerly avail myself of the opportunity to supplement and, if possible, to fortify their forcible and well-merited arraignment of the committee, and to this end I desire to call the earnest and prayerful attention of the House to another item in this bill, which by inadvertence they overlooked, appearing on page 11, which is equally susceptible of serious criticism. On the page referred to we are confronted with this startling provision:

The name of Sarah A. Jefferson, widow of Joseph Jefferson, late of Company K, Eighth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Why, I ask in the joint names of propriety and accuracy, are we cunningly deprived of evidence by this neglectful committee which would be so controlling and enlightening upon the all-important full and complete name of "Sarah A. Jefferson?" [Laughter.] Had her middle initial appeared as a modest and retiring "V" all intelligent thespian historians on this floor would have instantly deduced that that initial was synonymous with "Van Winkle," for she is boldly and bluntly stated to be "the widow of Joseph Jefferson," and the conclusion would be absolutely irresistible, that name being so inseparably associated with that of the immortal impersonator of the famous "Rip" that the mere initial would have carried its own convincing proof. [Laughter.] And, too, as a further rebuke to the thoughtlessness of the committee, it may be said that it is contrary to the truth of history to designate him as a "soldier," and especially as a "colored" soldier. Of course, he was neither. The only war ever engaged in by "Joseph Jefferson" consisted of the innumerable war of words with his recalcitrant spouse, and in which, it may be stated, he was always on the defensive and was finally ignominously routed, and the only gun he ever handled was his trusty and, as subsequent developments proved, rusty fowling piece which led him, with his faithful dog, "Schneider," to the hazy heights of the Catskills in quest of game, and the "game," as well as the gun, as is well known, conspired to his undoing in his long and forgetful sleep. Alas, to use Rip's own brief but mournful soliloquy, "How soon are we forgot when we are gone." Poor old Rip, in the cold, gray dawn of the morning, after his memorable festivities with the "boys of the glen," completely lost his identity, just as the "Sarah" of this late day has lost hers in its essential entirety; and it is eminently desirable that we should now ascertain why the committee should withhold this important bit of enlightenment in this instance, namely, who is "Sarah A. Jefferson" and why it failed to probe further into the true significance of the initial "A." Had the faithful "Schneider" been called as a witness he could have doubtless established her true identity. [Laughter.]

The termigant spouse in the legend of Irving bore the simple and familiar designation "Dame Van Winkle," and as the personality of "Joseph Jefferson" was so completely merged into that of "Rip Van Winkle," and as his energetic wife is nowhere named "Sarah A.," although she might have been, we are led to suspect some ulterior motive on the part of the committee. Why their reticence in disclosing the full middle name? If it were "Ann," "Annie," "Arabella," "Adaline," or any other good English name above the realm of suspicion, why not have unhesitatingly revealed it?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, herein lies the very pith and essence of the natural suspicion attaching to the committee, for we are reluctantly forced to the conclusion, in the absence of the necessary and much-desired proof to the contrary, that the middle name of this widow of "Joseph Jefferson" may have been "Aspasia," as an hereditary compliment to that seemingly irresistible Grecian enchantress of the golden tresses and olive cast whom we are told, with reckless abandon, lured the fickle swains of ancient Greece from the paths of rectitude to the gilded palace of sin; and having by a master stroke of ingenuity secured this piece of inside information, the committee doubtless virtuously, but nevertheless quite reprehensibly, suppressed the evidence and contented itself with the simple and otherwise guileless letter "A."

Mr. Chairman, I feel keenly this wanton lack of frankness on the part of the committee. Are we, as American legislators, to be juggled with, and is important information of this character to be with impunity withheld from us? [Laughter.]

I might, Mr. Chairman, take exception to numerous other serious delinquencies on the part of the committee but my time is too limited to recount them. Suffice it to say, in conclusion, that I am in hearty accord with the just criticisms of my friends upon my left with respect to their attitude toward these old, seared soldiers, because I feel that that committee is guilty of a deliberate fraud, or attempted fraud, upon the Treasury when it agrees to report a bill to pay a pension of $20 a month to a widow of a deceased soldier whose name is simply said to be "Sarah A," without furnishing the important and necessary proof even that her name was actually "Sarah," and also the further substantiation of her full and complete middle name [laughter], and to stigmatize the greatest actor of the modern age by associating him with a negro regiment without any explanation, or submitting proof that he was not really "acting a part," is nothing short of a national humiliation and outrage, and fully sympathizing with the sentiments of my colleagues and in the interest of the already overburdened taxpayers of the country, I here and now as a Representative in this great Congress against this diabolical, colossal, and inexcusable outrage I desire to register my solemn protest. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Julia A. Rouse, widow of Oliver H. P. Rouse, late of Company D, Eighteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that Julia A. Rouse is placed upon this list, and there are two reasons why her name should be stricken from it.

In the first place, the record shows that her husband, Oliver H. P. Rouse, had no pensionable status; that he could not draw a pension; and where he could not draw a pension under the law, then his widow can not draw a pension. Why? Because it does not appear that he received any injury while in the service.

The gentlemen of the committee thoroughly understand that principle. In the second place, it ought to be stricken because the widow married since 1890. She has no standing before this committee as a widow. She was married since the date of act of June 27, 1890.

There are two reasons; and yet they have placed this woman's name upon this list. If you read the report of the committee, you will find that two of her children have been on the pension roll, and stayed on there until they were 16 years of age.

The Government paid them without authority. They had no right upon this pension roll. Their father did not have a right to draw a pension and therefore they could not draw a pension.

Now, these things are in the committee's report. You do not have to go out and seek them; they are right here before your eyes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. The report shows that the soldier was pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, and that he died on August 11, 1898. That is shown in the report on the bill H. R. 835, on page 4 of this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] has expired. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Louisa Pitts, widow of Jacob Pitts, late of Company D, One hundred and thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of reading to the gentleman this statement. He questioned the correctness of my statement. It is stated here in this report that the widow when she applied for a pension under the general law was denied because the soldier's death from dysentery and chronic diarrhea was not shown to be due to his military service in the war.

Mr. LANGLEY. He was not pensioned because of disability incurred in service. That is true. He was pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I do not make statements that I can not stand for in this House. The report reads as follows:

She applied for pension under the general law, which was denied because soldier's death from dysentery and chronic diarrhea was not shown to be due to his military service. Having married soldier subsequent to June 27, 1890, she had no status under that act.

Now, sir, you have the exact language of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Jeshuron Bailey, late of Company A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I surely have no disposition to obstruct legislation in this House further than it would seem necessary and proper to do it in the interest of good legislation. As I said before, every bill here may be a good one; I do not know. I am ready to support it if it is.

I would like to have information, however, that would justify me in the support of these measures. I would be glad to support them if I can. But the House has determined on a vote that it does not want to hear the reports read in this House. I have read some of them myself. On a motion here the House determined that it did not want the reports read. It clearly appears from the debate that the committee is unable to give any explanation in the majority of the cases that have been up as to why this legislation is asked for. It is a lot of legislation tumbled into a bill here that is sought to be passed without, so far as the facts show, any reason for it. Surely I am doing my duty when I insist that the facts ought to be intelligently stated by some one in this House who knows them before we act upon them. Surely the report of the committee, meager and insufficient as it is, ought to be read. But if the Democratic Party, coming into power, is willing to proceed along this line of legislation in this way I think there is nothing that more thoroughly demonstrates its unfitness and its incapacity than a precedure along this line in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Elizabeth M. Rutherford, widow of George Rutherford, late of Company F, Second Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TRIBBLE. In this report you will find with reference to the claim of Elizabeth Rutherford the following words:

Her application under the general law was rejected December 13, 1900, on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease of heart was not known to be of service origin.

In the first place the claim of this woman was rejected. In the second place, she came before this Congress years ago, because she could not get a pension under the general laws of this country, and a special act was passed putting her name on the pension roll when she was not entitled to go there. To-day we see her moving on the Treasury of the United States to get an increase. We are asked here to-day to pass a second special act increasing that special pension from $12 to $20. Why? Because, forsooth, this woman is worth $4,000 or $5,000. What about these old war widows throughout the country who are receiving nothing, really dependent and deserving? What have you to say about them—widows who are 65, 70, and 80 years of age—who have not a dollar in this world? What have you to say of the old widows from one end of this country to the other who are receiving $12 a month? Yet you take up the case of one who is not entitled to a pension at all, who was pensioned by special act, and you now propose by special act to increase her pension from $12 to $20 a month, and she worth $4,000 or $5,000. In the name of humanity, if you insist on raiding the Treasury for pensions, give to the poor and worthy. This woman has 18 lots in Minneapolis and a homestead in Custer County and no pension standing, yet this is the second special act for her benefit.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up the time of the committee on this bill, but in view of the fact that some statements were made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] in my absence, and now by the gentleman from Georgia, I beg the indulgence of the committee just a moment. I personally know something of the facts of the case. This woman has been known to be in poor health for years, and I can say without exaggeration that she is nervously broken down. Her husband was a worthy soldier for nearly four years. He was sergeant of his company. This woman married him in 1867 and raised a family. She is drawing a pension of $12 a month, as I understand the facts, under the act of 1890. I personally know the family. They stand well. She has had much trouble to break her down nervously, and the only criticism that can fairly be made is with reference to property matters. The report would seem to show, and the facts are on their face, that if the property could be sold at what it is considered to be worth there might be an equity of something like $2,700. It is heavily taxed. I know from the location of the property that it is hardly salable at the present time, and has not been for years, and no income from it. I know that the woman has had a struggle to live.

I want to say generally in regard to pensions that there is one thing that has impressed me ever since I have been a Member of this House. While we have been generous and perhaps have granted to men in many cases greater pensions than they deserve, we have never been generous or even just to the widows of worthy soldiers. [Applause.] If we would fittingly recognize the valuable and trusted services of a man who for four years fought for his country and would fittingly honor his memory and his service, it would include some honor to the widow whom he has left, who is struggling for a living. I do not believe there is an item in this bill more worthy or more just than this one. I personally know this woman. I knew her family personally. I knew her late husband personally to some extent. I am not here to urge bills that are unconscionable or unjust, and I appeal to you to know if this is an unjust bill which gives $20, an increase of $8, to a struggling widow who is nearly 70 years of age.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:
"The name of James L. Davenport, of Company B, Fortieth Wisconsin Regiment, $1 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to make the point of order that the amendment is out of order because it is not germane.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point comes too late.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is not too late, Mr. Chairman. I endeavored to get recognition as soon as the reading was finished and just as the gentleman took the floor for debate.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the Chair has any misgivings I should like to submit——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. LANGLEY. That the amendment is not germane to the bill, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the amendment is germane.

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). That it is not germane to the purpose of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the amendment is germane. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] is recognized and has four minutes remaining.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to in this amendment is none other than the Commissioner of Pensions of the United States, who for many years has been drawing a salary of $5,000 a year from the Government as such Pension Commissioner, and in addition to that for 20 years has been drawing a pension of $16 or more per month.

I hold in my hand a card which contains these words:

John R. King, past commander in chief Grand Army of the Republic; president of the Grand Army Club of Maryland—and four other official connections that he has with the Grand Army of the Republic. I hold in my hand a communication signed by this gentleman, whom I do not know. Effort may be made to show that he had as bad a record as Gen. Francis Adams had, whose views of the pension system I called to the attention of the House some time ago. I do not know. I never saw Mr. Davenport. Here is his military record as given by Past Commander in Chief Grand Army of the Republic King:

At the end of the Civil War, at a period when big bounties were being paid, he (Commissioner Davenport) enlisted in Company B, Fortieth Wisconsin One hundred Days Regiment. He never got within 40 miles of the front, never heard a hostile gun fired, yet 21 years after the war—July, 1886—while holding a position in the Pension Bureau, had himself placed on the pension rolls at $16 per month for chronic diarrhea by certificate numbered 431111. This is a travesty on the pension laws and warrants congressional investigation. Twenty-one years plus 20 years with chronic diarrhea would mean by this time, if by a miracle he still lives, a human skeleton. But look at him, a perfect picture of health, and it is said that he is a constant sufferer from constipation.

Call for the papers in his case and demand that he be examined by a board of surgeons, not of his own appointment, however. He is constantly dropping men from the rolls "disability ceased." Give him a dose of his own medicine.

This is the language of his comrade, King—not mine.

I also hold in my hand an autograph letter, under date of January 2 of this year, dated Baltimore, Md., addressed to me by John R. King, as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., January 2, 1913.

Hon. S. A. RODDENBERY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe you are in favor of honest pensions to the survivors of the Civil War. So are all real soldiers.

I inclose a copy of the military record of James L. Davenport, Commissioner of Pensions. I believe the pension rolls should be purged of all such frauds. Think of it. This man, who never got within 40 miles of the front, never heard a hostile gun fired, 21 years after the war has himself placed on the pension rolls at $16 per month for chronic diarrhea. Could it be possible for a man to live that long with such a wasting disease? And according to law he must be still suffering from it or be dropped from the rolls. At the time he received that pension I, who served 2 years and 10 months (34 months), wounded three times, crippled for life, with 5½ inches of bone out of my right leg, and must use a mechanical brace to enable me to walk, was receiving the magnificent sum of $10 per month.

Is this not a clear case for congressional inquiry? The country has a right to know how and by what means he got on the rolls and is still there. I hope, in the interest of the Government and in justice to the real soldiers who bore the whole heat and burden of the day, that this inquiry shall be made, and you are the man to demand it.

Respectfully,

JOHN R. KING.

Gentlemen, I think we had better give him $1 and thus cut the graft off that he is getting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were 11 ayes and 89 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Torger Hansod, late of Company G, Fifth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the formal amendment in line 13, page 3, in the name "Hansod" that the "d" be changed to an "n" so that it will read "Hanson."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of John D. Sampson, late of Company K, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table and be postponed for two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back with the recommendation that it be postponed for two weeks.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do that that we may look into these things.

Mr. RUSSELL. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the motion is in order.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were 4 ayes and 97 noes.

So the motion was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Jennie Harding, widow of Hewitt Harding, late of Company G, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 15, page 6, by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen," so that it will read "$16 a month."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I think it is fair to call the attention of the committee to this fact. The record shows in this bill, and it is undisputed, that a woman worth $3,100 of net property is being given a pension of $30 a month; yet here is this paragraph that gives a woman $12 a month whom the report says—if it can be relied upon, and they say we must trust the committee—has no property at all and is helpless and dependent. It is a queer thing to me that a woman worth $3,100 is recommended by a committee for $30 a month, while a poor, forsaken woman, without property and without means, is to get only $12 a month. I will not go the whole distance for fear that gentlemen might be afraid of trespassing on a depleted Treasury. I merely raise it to $16 a month, so that this helpless widow can get as much pension as the Commissioner of Pensions, who draws a permanent disability pension of $16 a month and $5,000 a year salary from the Government besides.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand in this case that the bill asks for only $12.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 6, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of David A. Wynegar, late of Company F, Sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following proviso as an amendment to be placed at the end of that section:

Provided, That no pensioner under this or any act shall attend the White House receptions in a swallow-tail coat.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order that it is not germane and that it is ridiculous.

Mr. LANGLEY. And several other things.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, it is a limitation on the appropriation. It will cost less money for these pensioners to go to these receptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Elizabeth Shock, widow of Lemuel W. Shock, late of Company I, Ninety-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, if one will take the time to read this report—and some Members of the House do not seem to want to know anything about the report—he will find some things in here that will interest him. I think I can point out some things in this report that ought to at least interest the Members of this House, and I know will open the eyes of the country.

Mr. RUSSELL. From what page of the report is the gentleman reading?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will now take up page 25 of the report, the case of Elizabeth Shock. The report reads as follows:

Both claims were rejected on the ground of claimant's inability to prove that she is soldier's legal widow, being unable to prove the death or divorce of her first husband.

The Pension Bureau, Mr. Chairman, refused to pension a woman whose husband was in all probability living. The Pension Bureau said the duty was upon her to show that her husband was dead or that she was divorced; and yet this virtuous committee comes in here and claims that this House ought to take everything that it does without question. Let me call the attention of the House and of the chairman of this committee to the facts. This woman was never divorced and that real husband is no doubt living, yet the woman is drawing a pension as his widow. Where is that deserter? Now, what has the gentleman to say in his virtuous indignation about that? It does seem to me that this House ought to have these exposures made on the floor of this House if the committee insists time after time on coming in here and bringing in reports, with deserters and bounty jumpers and all kinds of claims, including negroes with no pensionable status.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. No. I usually yield, but I will not yield at this moment. The husband of the woman is living. I rose to call especial attention to another claim on this same page—a negro camp follower.

On the following page you will find the Jefferson negro of whom my friend from Colorado spoke with so much levity. This negro is named Ailer, not Jefferson.

There are two negroes, one following right after the other on successive pages. One is defended on the ground that he happened to have the name of Jefferson. Let me tell the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] that he had better turn back with me to page 10.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Of the report?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes. I just happened to pick this up since you made your remarks. On page 10 he will find two widows, one named Moore and one named Shattuck. These two widows are going through this life with one foot in the grave—79 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to take one minute in this case. As I understand, the gentleman is mistaken about the fact. I understand the gentleman to state that this lady's husband was a deserter.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What does the report say?

Mr. RUSSELL. It says that her former husband was a deserter. Her name is now Elizabeth Shock. She is the widow of a soldier named Lemuel W. Shock, and her former husband, whose name was John Flower, was a deserter. She married Shock in 1866, and the presumption, of course, is that her other husband, who has not been heard from since he deserted, is dead.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What law is there in this country that contains such a presumption, or what court in this country will adopt such presumption?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is a law in this country that where a man is absent and not heard of for seven years he is presumed to be dead.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Where is the evidence of that fact? She married in four years after her husband deserted and had no divorce. Why do you not bring the report to the committee here in full?

Mr. RUSSELL. Why did you state this was the widow of a deserter? This woman's husband, whom she married in 1866, was not a deserter.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It does not improve the matter that she was mixed up with a man when her husband was gone and unaccounted for and remarried in four years without a divorce. She was not legally married to this man, and therefore has no right to a pension. I do not know whether her husband deserted her or not, the record does not show—she may have deserted him. He deserted the Army.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Mary M. Ackerman, widow of Curtis Ackerman, late of Company E, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Colorado will turn to the report he will find that these widows are drawing $12 each; and here is the wife of a negro man who is drawing a pension of $20 a month, as provided for in this bill, and she was not a war widow at all. Now, these war widows went through the war; they suffered the hardships of the war; they went almost to the mouth of death in suffering the perils through which they had to go. This committee takes up a negro woman who did not go through the war and gives her $20, preferring her to white war widows. I am satisfied the gentleman from Colorado is too fair to come on the floor of this House and defend the committee in any such proceeding.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Constituted as I am, it is impossible for me to reply to the gentleman from Georgia. I have not the sense of humor to do it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Theodore L. Trew, late of Company D, Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, on page 13, line 15, I move to strike out the figures "40" and insert "30."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 15, strike out the figures "40" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "30."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th of May, 1912, the general pension bill was passed. Gentlemen here are familiar with it. It begins at the age of 62 years or over, and measures the differing times in which the soldiers served in the Army. One of 62 years of age only gets a less pension than one of 70 years of age. One who serves 6 months gets a less pension than one who served 18 months or 36 months, and so on. These old soldiers are scheduled by periods of service and by their age. That law contains the following provisions:

That any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late Civil War, who has been honorably discharged therefrom, and who has reached the age of 62 years or over, shall, upon making proof of such facts, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the pension roll and be entitled to receive a pension as follows: In case such person has reached the age of 62 years and served 90 days, $13 per month; 6 months, $13.50 per month; 1 year, $14 per month; 1½ years, $14.50 per month; 2 years, $15 per month; 2½ years, $15.50 per month; 3 years or over, $16 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 66 years and served 90 days, $15 per month; 6 months, $15.50 per month; 1 year, $16 per month; 1½ years, $16.50 per month; 2 years, $17 per month; 2½ years, $18 per month; 3 years or over, $19 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 70 years and served 90 days, $18 per month; 6 months, $19 per month; 1 year, $20 per month, 1½ years, $21.50 per month; 2 years, $23 per month; 2½ years, $24 per month; 3 years or over, $25 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 75 years and served 90 days, $21 per month; 6 months, $22.50 per month; 1 year, $24 per month; 1½ years, $27 per month; 2 years or over, $30 per month. That any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge, and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor by reason thereof, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month, without regard to length of service or age.

Notice that the law says:

That any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge, and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty, and is now unfit for manual labor by reason thereof, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month, without regard to length of service or age.

There will be perhaps 400,000 regular pensioners under the foregoing act. It does occur to me that for these special bills to come in here from time to time, raising other soldiers no more dependent, no more deserving, to $36, to $40, and to $50 is not an act of justice to the great mass of Union soldiers, but it is an act of discrimination that places these few fortunate pensioners in a class above the vast multitude of the old heroes of that great war. And I submit to the judgment of gentlemen if it is in keeping with a wise and patriotic policy for certain favored soldiers to obtain $36, $40, or $50 a month pension when the vast rank and file of their old comrades in arms are patriotically, contentedly, and with satisfaction accepting all the way from $30 down to $15?

I trust that gentlemen will be moved to reduce these $40 amounts and $50 amounts to $30, so that they may not be favored by special legislation above the other thousands of old soldiers who are abiding in the general law of the country.

I should like to read some letters—thousands, I say; yes, thousands—from Union soldiers of this country which I have received since one year ago from now. But I do not desire to discontent those old heroes with their condition. I do not desire to present their names or their communications to the committee unless necessities require it; but I would like to see them all, in their enfeebled years, live with confidence in the justness of their lawmakers, with confidence that they are all treated justly, equally, fairly, and that there is no favoritism in high place, and that there is no soldier with political pull who can get any more consideration from Congress than the rank and file of these old men. We should not go on from week to week passing favoritism in legislation for 100 or 200 men when thousands go on their way to the grave contented in their equality with their colleagues, as in equality they went to the front to fight from 1860 to 1865. It is a matter of national justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. CURLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It was not my purpose to participate in the debate, but I heard the gentleman on the other side of the Chamber say he had a large number of letters from different citizens, veterans of the war, and I heard one of those letters read in regard to the Pension Commissioner, Mr. Davenport, and I learned for the first time here this afternoon that loyalty to country was an insignia of dishonor, and that loyalty to one's comrades was something that deserved universal condemnation.

I made it my business to telephone the Pension Commissioner, and he informed me that he endeavored on three occasions to enlist in the Union Army in his native section in New Hampshire, but was rejected because of his youthfulness. He was less than 18 years of age, and in order that he might serve his country, in order that he might assist in keeping this Union whole, he left home, a boy under 18 years of age, and worked his way westward to Wisconsin, and was finally accepted and enlisted in Wisconsin; that he served five months in the Civil War in Mississippi and in Tennessee, and that he participated in the battle of Memphis, on August 5, 1864.

I can very readily conceive that some joker has been indulging in the very pleasing task of writing letters, and if my good friend from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] had used a little judgment and exercised a little humor he would have seen the humorous side of the letter which declared that a man became subject to chronic diarrhea who was not within 40 miles of the sound of a gun.

His reference to the present condition of the commissioner and his acceptance of a pension is an unwarranted gratuity. The commissioner should feel ashamed of himself, and his comrades in arms would be justified in feeling ashamed of him, if because of his financial condition he refused to accept of a pension and, in other words, said to the world that a pension by this Government to one who was ready when a mere boy to lay down his life that the Government might live would cause him to be regarded as an object of charity instead of its being the fulfillment of a contract between the Government and an individual who enlisted in order that the Union might remain whole. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is the most flagrant insult ever offered to an old soldier in the history of this House. [Applause.] In the light of the testimony of the commissioner himself, who would not dare state an untruth as far as his record is concerned, because it could be easily discovered by an investigation of the records at the War Department, I believe it is not only unjust, but it is unwarranted, it is unfair, and it should be condemned. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee for a moment or two. I wanted to answer the gentleman from Georgia awhile ago when he was attacking the Commissioner of Pensions, but I refrained from doing so because I wanted to expedite as much as possible the passage of the bill by avoiding unnecessary debate. Now that the matter has been mentioned, I want to say that in my judgment there is not a more capable, a more efficient, or a more honorable officer of this Government than J. L. Davenport. I have known him for a quarter of a century. Many years ago he and I were fellow clerks in the Pension Office. I have known him well during all the intervening years. His life, both public and private, has been upright and honorable, and his record is that of a faithful and patriotic public servant, whose merit has advanced him from a humble to the highest position in a great bureau. Of his record as a soldier I need not speak. The gentleman from Massachusetts has done that and has done it well. The things that have been said against him here to-day can do him no harm—certainly not with those who know him or his record. But, Mr. Chairman, as his personal friend I feel it my duty to say this much to the country in his defense in view of what has already gone in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not personally cognizant of the facts with relation to Commissioner Davenport, but I accept what has been stated as true. I do know the facts, however, in connection with the old soldier named in the paragraph just read. He served his country for four years. He is a hopeless paralytic. He owns no property. He has no means of support. He requires attendance day and night, and is wholly dependent upon friends and relatives for assistance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 15, by striking out the figures "40" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "30."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Emanuel B. Silcott, late of Company E, Sixth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, in the few remarks that I have to make at this time I will cover several cases at once and thus shorten the matter by not waiting to take them up case by case.

I want to call attention to the fact that in the next four pages, containing some 10 or 12 cases successively following, are cases where the service was limited to from 3 to 10 months. Now, this committee comes in here and proposes to enact special legislation for short-term soldiers, for men who never saw real service. It proposes in this lump of 10 or 12 cases to discriminate against the old soldier who fought for four years, who went almost to the mouth of hell, who saw service in storm, amid shot and shell; and here are men who never saw real service, men of four months' and three months' enlistments, who are taken up by this committee and preferred over the old soldiers of four and five years' service.

Now, in this list there is one case intervening to which I call particular attention. It is the case of a party possessing property preferred over and above those who have no property. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but, as the record shows, the soldier was rejected. There is the book, there is the report. Read it. Now, this pensioner with money, with property, but with no pensionable status—that virtuous committee that never commits an error prefers this man of property with no right to pension to the poor, long-service soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Mary L. Brent, widow of James K. Brent, late of Company E, One hundred and thirty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to hear the Clerk read. What page is he reading?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 15, line 12. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Robert Platt, late of Company H, One hundred and twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know precisely whether this motion should be made or not. If I entertained the hope that in order to act intelligently and accurately upon these pension matters the Committee on Invalid Pensions would join me in a resolution of inquiry to ascertain how many employees and officers of the Government are drawing over $1,000 salary from the Government and at the same time drawing pensions as ex-soldiers, on the ground of physical incapacity to do work and labor and on the ground of permanent physical disability, I do not know that I would press this motion. If I believed I could get the Committee on Invalid Pensions to bring out a resolution of that character and let us go down the line with an investigation of the Interior Department and the War Department and the Treasury Department and the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the customhouses and ascertain how many people employed there are drawing pensions on the ground of inability to work and labor and are also drawing at the same time salaries all the way from $1,000 to $5,000 a year, I should be content. If gentlemen will agree to that inquiry, then my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY] will not have to rush to the telephone to inquire of Mr. Davenport about what his war record is or what his physical condition is. Order an investigation which will give a chance to go before a fair committee, and I will face the Commissioner of Pensions there. Gentlemen will not need the telephone then. John R. King, the old past commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, will face him there, and we will demonstrate that the joke the gentleman referred to will disclose that the honorable commissioner draws a pension to-day, on the ground not of wounds, not of injury, but of a disease that physically incapacitates him for work. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] says that he was in the Pension Office with him years ago for many years, where they worked together. This Commissioner of Pensions is drawing a salary of $5,000 a year and is preserving his record in the Army and securing the recognition of his patriotic services by getting a pension of $16 a month. I do not know John R. King, but John R. King and I will be there if you will have a committee to investigate it; and if John R. King or the Member from Georgia have made statements that are not justified, condemnation will fall where it belongs. I challenge you now to open the record and let Congress and the people see.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George W. Tyler, late of Company D, Thirty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I read from the rules of the Invalid Pensions Committee, House of Representatives, Sixty-second Congress, the part of the rule touching this matter.

The Pension Committees of the two Houses of Congress were created to consider a very few claims in which, from their peculiar circumstances of extreme disability and destitution, adequate relief could not be obtained from the bureau, and also to consider a limited number of claims, some of which were necessarily rejected by the bureau for the reason that they were not covered by any existing law, while others were rejected upon legal or medical technicalities which Congress could properly set aside as a matter of equity and justice. It was not the intention to have Congress flooded with pension bills.

This bill makes about 6,000 private pensions for this Congress to date. In the last Congress there were 9,000, and the number theretofore had been steadily growing. Yet the rule says that it was never intended that wholesale special pension legislation should be thus enacted. In the very language of the committee, it was to consider a "very few cases," a "limited number." Yet you may turn to any copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since this session of Congress opened and find what has taken place. I turn to January 6, 1913. You can turn to any day in January or any day in December, and you will find an entire page of 50 or more bills, all granting increases of pension or special pension bills; and every volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since the beginning of this session of Congress and since the passage of the Sherwood bill will show a wholesale record of applications and bills for increases of pension, for new pensions, for special pension legislation, notwithstanding the rule of the committee says it was never designed for anything except a "few cases" of rare destitution and a "limited number" of those who are unfortunate.

Gentlemen, it is a mad rush to grant pensions, to gratify persons at home with strong political influence themselves in many cases and strong political influence of family and others, as well as the honest merits of many of these cases which we are willing, cheerfully, and readily to concede. Yet we can not have any debate. With the exception of two or three gentlemen, no man rises here to explain his pension bill. Nobody comes to explain the case of the widow, the old soldier, or the orphan. But the minute you touch the head of the Pension Bureau, who is drawing a salary of $5,000, great God, Massachusetts and Kentucky and Ohio all rush in by telephone to exonerate him and give him a good record. Why, in the name of justice, do you not defend these destitute, dependent, and unfortunate pensioners. O you authors of these bills, where are you?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Francis B. Overlook, late of Company F, Ninth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. If I were allowed to do so, I would like to have the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Massachusetts who communicated with the Pension Office just now over the telephone, to again communicate with the Pension Office between now and 7 o'clock and find out whether or not there is an officer under a salary from the Government now in the Pension Office, drawing a pension for total deafness, who answers the telephone every day. I wonder if gentlemen will find out between now and 7 o'clock if that is true. Was he deaf when he got his pension? And if he is not now deaf, the law is that if his disability becomes removed his pension stops. I wish gentlemen would find out over the telephone, if the man was deaf when he got the pension and is not deaf now when he answers the telephone, whether he is still drawing a pension.

Now, gentlemen, come to the rescue of the Pension Department, if you can do it; let us have the investigation. Call for it and we will find out. Of course it may develop that they have installed in Washington a system of telephones whereby the deaf can hear as well as those not so afflicted. I am sure gentlemen can run to the telephone and find out from Commissioner Davenport or his daily associate who answers the telephone every day whether he now is drawing a pension because he is totally deaf.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Jesse M. Manson, late of Company A, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

During the call of the roll the following occurred:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

The committee rose; and Mr. MURRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that the Committee of the Whole finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called and 138 Members had answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees to the House.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Melvin J. Ringler, late of Company C, Sixty-fourth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that this item provides for a pension of $30 a month for a musician. It seems to me that it is not quite fair to the old soldiers who participated in a carnage of battle, unequaled in the history of all times, that they should be paid $10 and $12, $15, $25, or $30 a month and that a musician by a special act of this Congress should get $30 a month. That does not look fair to me, but I will tell you what hurts me worse than that. It seems still more unfair to me to know that that musician, parading in the band with long-tailed coat, had a colored face and was followed by an infantry of his own color. If you gentlemen can go back to your constituents and explain to them how you can offord to give a negro musician more pension than the old soldiers who followed the banner from one to five years and went through that carnage of strife, then it is up to you to do it. I feel that it is my duty to call this matter to the attention of the House and the country in order that the country may know what you are doing. I propose to put the country on notice what you are doing with the money of men who live by the sweat of their brow. All men who see this protest from me who think this negro should have $30 per month I want them to write me, so stating.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Lorrenna J. Wilkinson, widow of Alfred Wilkinson, late acting third assistant engineer, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention of the House to this case. The report reads:

She never applied for a pension, as, having married sailor subsequent to June 27, 1890, she is barred under act of April 19, 1908.

This woman, as this record shows, owns $2,800 worth of property; nearly $3,000 worth. The record shows that she is not entitled to be placed on this pension roll. She was not placed here. She has been ruled out by the Bureau of Pensions. She is worth $3,000, and, of course, as we all know, these estimates are usually about one-third of the real value of the property; but just take the record as it is here. Yet she is placed on this roll without any pensionable standing whatever.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, as we read along here that it is not out of place, certainly, to call the attention of the country to these things and to place this case in the record in order that the old soldiers at home who have not a dollar in this world and who served through the war, as I have mentioned before, may have it called to their attention that others who have property are being preferred to them. It is up to you gentlemen to explain these things. I am calling the attention of the country to the fact.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Rachel Sturgeon, widow of William A. Sturgeon, late of Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Lucy Elma Sturgeon, helpless and dependent daughter of said William A. Sturgeon, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Rachel Sturgeon, the name of said Lucy Elma Sturgeon shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Rachel Sturgeon.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph just read that the proviso is not in order, on the ground that there is no authority in law and the Congress is without jurisdiction to pass an act based upon such a remote contingency.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Elizabeth W. Wilcox, widow of Benjamin Wilcox, late of Company D, One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I would be very glad, Mr. Chairman, if the report gave some full information on the subject, but, as pointed out by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the report is indefinite, and the committee will not even answer interrogations respecting it. I desire to say this, that I feel much gratified at the results to-day, which are beyond all expectations. Twelve months ago, and for several months thereafter, when these matters arose, I had to stand almost alone with the report of the committee and the bill and present these matters to the committee. But few of my colleagues seemed then to think it of sufficient importance to fight over. Moreover, many then said it was a hopeless undertaking. It is gratifying now for me to know that my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], with greater ability, and with more force, and with greater clearness has to-day fallen in line and is calling the attention of the committee to the fact that these reports are ill-considered and filled with deserters. It renews my courage to see others now doing likewise. I hope, in the course of months, that other gentlemen will fall into line. It is well known that gentlemen from various portions of the country tell these things to their constituents at home, and I have often been surprised that they do not stand up here and repeat on the floor what they say on the stump.

I merely desire to state to the committee that I shall likely divert my attention from these detailed items, and the reports of the committee, and leave it to these other gentlemen so that I may undertake in the course of the next few months, if possible, to make odious and a stench in the nostrils of this country the fact that the administration of our pension laws permit high officers who ride in automobiles, who draw high salaries, who cut the fastest step at the fashionable receptions in Washington, to draw big pensions from the Government, as well as salaries, the pensions being drawn for physical disability which incapacitates them from labor.

We have read into the RECORD the names of one or two of them, but as time goes by and opportunity presents itself we shall put into the public record the names of more of these pension-grafting high cockalorums of Washington society who disdain the street car and scoff at one who appears at an evening dinner in a business suit because he can not afford to wear a swallowtail coat and a white vest adorned with pearl studs. I sometimes wonder what these poor old soldiers out in the West drawing $15 a month would think of their disabled city comrade who draws a $3,000 salary from the Government and $50 a month pension if he could see him some night doing the "turkey trot" act at a swell Washington social function. Mr. Chairman, it is iniquitous; it is outrageous; it is a national shame.

A MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And the gentlemen who are calling "louder" after a while will be voting for a resolution of investigation. You will not have the political courage not to do it. Ah, you can say "louder," but I will lead you like driven sheep and you will either dodge the vote or vote for an investigation. Louder! Ah, it will be louder then. You will rush back home to proclaim how you voted to expose the pension steals. Yes, Mr. Chairman, then we will find out who are these long-coated, patent-leathered, pearl-studded gentlemen who are drawing big salaries and pensions from the Government because they can neither labor nor work, who in order to get a pension claimed to have all of the infirmities that are found in the catalogue of the science of medicine. When this subject, by investigation, is held up to public view our legislation permitting such impostors to prey upon the tax money of the citizen will yet stink in the nostrils of the people and they will rise up and through you and through me, by legislation, will spew them out from the pension rolls of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 4 of the bill in order that I may move to strike out the paragraph from lines 5 to 8, inclusive, the beneficiary, William Dalton, being dead.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Reserving the right to object, for what purpose is it?

Mr. RUSSELL. The beneficiary is dead, and I desire to ask unanimous consent to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri that the item on page 4 of the bill, from lines 5 to 8, inclusive, be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Henry C. Gray, late of Company I, One hundred and sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio National Guard Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-six Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted "Present."

The SPEAKER. One hundred and eleven Members are present—a quorum.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MURRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 27475) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, that 111 Members had answered to their names, and that he reported the names of the absentees to the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I move that the message of the President, now on the Speaker's table, be read.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing to do but to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and besides there is no message on the table. [Laughter.]

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Marinda Lowe, widow of John Lowe, late of Company D, One hundred and seventy-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I will be glad, Mr. Chairman, to avoid striking out this paragraph, but evidently the committee will do it when the vote is taken. If the chairman would advise us that his committee would cooperate toward having an investigation of pension frauds, and those especially relating to pensions drawn by officials who also draw big salaries, the amendment would not now be offered.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes; I want to ask the chairman if he would use his offices to promote the passage of a resolution of inquiry into pensions drawn by persons as soldiers and war veterans who at this time are likewise drawing salaries in excess of $1,000 and up to $7,500, including Congressmen of the United States?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will vote for a bill at any time to amend the Sherwood bill so that it will not give any increase of pension to anyone who has an income of $1,000 or over, and I voted for that amendment when the Sherwood bill was before the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does not the gentleman think that for Congress to tabulate and locate these instances where now able-bodied men do draw pensions for alleged incapacity, and have a salary of over $1,000, would be the proper thing? In this way we may ascertain to what extent the pension roll of our Government is festooned with cases of able-bodied men who are drawing pensions and, at the same time, drawing large salaries from the Government in the Army, Navy, and all the Government departments? Is not that a fair proposition to investigate? I want to keep these old soldiers who served for four years separated from these grafters whom they say are on the pension roll. Some of them I know are on the pension roll and are at this moment drawing all the way from $1,000 to $7,500 a year in salaries, who are able enough to be Members of the United States Congress—they are able enough to be superintendents of great divisions of government, having under them thousands of employees. I ask the gentleman if he does not look with favor on such an inquiry and such an investigation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] has expired.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MURRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27475) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] for a moment.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 27941) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, which, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 1289), was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves all points of order on the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed Senate joint resolution 145, to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inauguration ceremonies in 1913.

SENATE RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, of Rule XXIV, the following Senate concurrent resolution and Senate joint resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 34.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 30,000 copies of the Judicial Code of the United States, prepared under the direction of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, 10,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, and 15,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate Document Room—to the Committee on Printing.

Senate joint resolution 145.

To provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913—to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill (H. R. 27475), just now considered by the House, and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. At what time is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The previous question being ordered, is it not in order now? I desire to offer a motion to recommit at this stage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that it is in order. The Chair will have the authorities examined. It will do no harm to have the motion read, anyway. The Clerk will report the motion submitted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under the practice, the previous question having been ordered, a motion to recommit is not in order until after the third reading of the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the rule the motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides:

It shall be in order, pending the motion for, or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

The custom has been—and it will serve the gentleman's purpose just as well—to make the motion after the third reading.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, if I may do so, I insist upon being recognized to make the motion now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion by Mr. RODDENBERY:

"I move to recommit H. R. 27475 to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with instructions to report the same back to the House with the following amendment:

"'Strike out the following names from said bill wherever they occur: William Andrew, N. A. Aller, E. B. Silcott, Daniel Wilson, P. L. Kenney, Wilson Murphy, Watson Boyden, William F. Ramsey, G. F. Slamps, M. J. Rengler, L. J. Wilkeson, William F. Mills, William D. Crawford, J. H. Rowland; women, Julia Rouse, Elizabeth Rutherford, Elizabeth Shock, Sarah Jefferson, Leah Jackson, Sarah Garber, Mary Brent, Sarah Sherman, Tilla Eckard.'"

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moves the previous question on the motion to recommit. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 5.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The previous question having been ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage, would it be in order to have this bill taken up and voted upon to-morrow morning for completion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 11, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 11, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is a situation regarding certain prominent officers in the Army whereby their nominations will have to be considered to-day or they go out of the Army. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON). The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 56 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, the respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last session of the Senate sitting for the consideration of the articles of impeachment.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the doors be closed for deliberation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the doors be closed for deliberation on the part of Senators. [Putting the question.].

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Before the motion is announced as having been carried, I will state that I submitted a communication to the President of the Senate this morning directing attention to what I think is an infraction of the rules of the Senate on the part of Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, who has withheld his remarks from the RECORD.

Mr. President, everyone else printed his remarks when those remarks were completed, without withholding them; and I know of no rule of any court which permits this to be done. Against that, Mr. President, I desire to say that I think it is improper. I have called the attention of the Presiding Officer to that fact, and I hope that the order made in this case will be observed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I have only to say, Mr. President, that after the late hour when we adjourned here last night, as soon as possible I got to work at the manuscript which had been forwarded to me and continued to work on it until midnight. I was then told that it was too late to get it in the RECORD of to-day.

I was not aware of any rule of the Senate which prevented this from being done, and I observed, I think, that the remarks of one of the managers, Mr. Manager HOWLAND, had been withheld.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order, which is that the motion to close the doors is not debatable.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, may I not make, with the permission of the Senator, another suggestion? The manager who is now addressing you remained at his office last night until the hour of 12.30 in order to read the manuscript of the report of his remarks made here yesterday, made after the gentleman who has just addressed you made his. And it will be borne in mind that Mr. Worthington made part of his argument day before yesterday.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in all fairness and due observance of this rule his remarks should have been in the RECORD this morning. This manager, who labored under greater disadvantage than he did, has put his in the RECORD this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair withheld the announcement of the vote out of courtesy to the manager on the part of the House of Representatives, which the Chair supposed would meet with the acquiescence and approval of the Senate. Strictly, of course, the order to close the doors ought to have been made, but this was the only opportunity, and the manager on the part of the House of Representatives, in the opinion of the Chair, was entitled to that courtesy. The Chair will now, however, declare that the motion of the Senator from Wyoming is carried, and the Sergeant at Arms is directed to clear the galleries and close the doors.

The managers on the part of the House, the respondent, and his counsel thereupon withdrew.

The galleries having been cleared, the Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

After 1 hour and 32 minutes the doors were reopened.

Mr. Worthington, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin, of counsel for the respondent, appeared.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer two separate orders, which I ask may be acted upon in the order in which they are sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the first order proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That on Monday, January 13, 1913, at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., a final vote be taken on the articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States.

The order was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next order submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate sitting as a High Court of Impeachment will on Monday, the 13th day of January, instant, at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., proceed to pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald.

The order was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the following order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That upon the final vote the Presiding Officer shall direct the Secretary to read the several articles successively, and after the reading of each article the Presiding Officer shall put the question following, namely:

"Mr. Senator ———, how say you; is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty of the high misdemeanors, or a high crime and misdemeanor, as the case may be, as charged in this article?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the order offered by the Senator from New York, which has just been read.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that the Chair is to adopt the formula as stated in the proposed order and address it to each Senator? Why not address it to the Senate and call the roll? In other words, why not address that inquiry to Senators collectively? That inquiry to each Senator will require vastly more time than the taking of the vote, and I do not see that it will serve any good purpose, but will simply consume time unnecessarily. I therefore move that an amendment be made to the order that will conform to that idea. What does the Senator from New York say to that?

Mr. ROOT. I have no objection to that. That was the form followed in the Johnson case and the Belknap case.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; but we have at hand a short session, and if the proceeding can be abbreviated somewhat without destroying its solemnity and importance I think it should be done.

Mr. ROOT. That can be ordered. If the order can be returned to me, I will modify it in order to meet that suggestion.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that Rule XXII covers the matter sufficiently. It reads that "on the final question whether the impeachment is sustained," which is the whole question, it seems to me, that ought to be submitted, "the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately."

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, as there seems to be some question regarding the form, I will withdraw this proposed order and leave the question open under the rule as it stands, without any addition.

Mr. OWEN. That is better.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is better.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the following order, which is a copy of the order made in the Belknap case.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending case each Senator may, in giving his vote, state his reasons therefor, occupying not more than one minute; which reason shall be entered in the Journal in connection with his vote; and each Senator may within two days after the final vote file his opinion in writing, to be published in the printed proceedings in the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the proposed order by striking out the first of it, relating to the one-minute explanation of a vote, so that the latter portion may still stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to amend the order as indicated.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is in Mexico on the investigating committee appointed by the Senate, and for that reason he is, unfortunately, absent.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 31, not voting 23, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Borah	Clapp	La Follette	Poindexter
Bourne	Crane	Lippitt	Sanders

So the amendment to the order was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the adoption of the order as amended.

The order as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask, for the information of counsel for the respondent, just in what form the question is to be put, under the action the Senate has just taken?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the question. Does counsel inquire of the Chair?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I was asking the Chair for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order adopted will leave it to the Chair to frame the question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment do now adjourn until Monday next at 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The managers on the part of the House, the respondent, and his counsel thereupon withdrew.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take up the conference report on the loan-shark bill, so called.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are we not in an unfinished state as to what the Senate actually did in reference to giving a unanimous consent

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in the nature of unfinished business. It can be called up again. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that the conference report on the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia be now taken up. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes appear to have it.

Mr. CURTIS. I call for a division.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to take up the conference report on House bill 8768, commonly known as the loan-shark bill. Upon that question the Senator from Kansas asks for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays. It will save time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to taking up this proposition at the present time, but I think before the Senate disposes of any other business we ought to settle the question whether the unanimous-consent agreement, or alleged unanimous-consent agreement, which has been so much discussed was, in fact, a unanimous-consent agreement. We ought to do that before we proceed with other business. Therefore I hope this motion will be voted down.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If this motion prevails, what will be its effect upon the unfinished business—the proposed constitutional amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it would be displaced. It is not now the morning hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want Senators to understand, before voting upon the pending motion, that that will be its effect.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not understand that it displaces the unfinished business except for the time being, and a motion is in order at any time to take up a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true; but when it is made out of the morning hour any vote of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of any particular matter will cause what has theretofore been the unfinished business to be displaced.

Mr. WARREN. I want to inquire just how the unfinished business would be before us to the exclusion of other business. Would it come up at 2 o'clock or what hour to-day?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is on the theory that the unfinished business is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now in order, but it has not been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the motion be withdrawn and the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and then temporarily laid aside. It was not my purpose to interfere with the unfinished business. I ask the consent of the Senate that that be done.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent, then, to withdraw the request for the time being, with the understanding that the unfinished business will be laid aside. I will then renew my motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, if it is not automatically before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his motion. That does not give him any right to the floor thereafter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None whatever.

Mr. STONE. I move to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business must first be laid before the Senate, and then a motion to lay it aside will be in order. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the loan-shark bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 8768.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not the question which has been raised as to the procedure of the Senate in connection with whether unanimous consent had been given in the nature of a privileged question, which should be disposed of?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. Certainly not unless the time had arrived when it was to be acted upon. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. CURTIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent from the Chamber because of illness in his family.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness, and is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ashurst	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Root
Bankhead	Dillingham	Myers	Sanders
Borah	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Simmons

So the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the report has been read, and I ask for a vote on it, unless some explanation is asked.

Mr. President, the main point in dispute between the House and the Senate is whether or not the pawnbrokers doing business in the city of Washington should be included in this loan-shark bill and limited in their charge of interest to 12 per cent per annum. The Senate committee first took the ground that because of the fact that there was a separate law applying to pawnbrokers, the act of 1889, any amendment in reference to them as to the amount of interest which might be charged by them should be considered as an amendment to that law.

But the bill was amended and sent to conference, and after several meetings it was found that the managers could not reach an agreement unless the pawnbrokers were included; and so at last the Senate conferees gave in on that point, and this bill as it has been agreed to and reported to the Senate, and to which report the Senate is requested to accede, includes pawnbrokers, and hereafter it will not be lawful for them to charge more than 1 per cent a month, or 12 per cent per annum, upon their loans.

Under the existing law they are permitted to charge 3 per cent a month, or 36 per cent a year. It was discovered, as I stated before, that some of the loan sharks in this city were charging poor, unfortunate men and women as high as 372 per cent for the loan of money, and your committee, after a most careful consideration, concluded that this bill was the best method by which the loan sharks could be regulated and controlled. So they have reported it. I think I may safely say that when this question was presented to the committee the vote was unanimous, that rather than defeat the loan-shark bill the pawnbrokers should be included in it.

With this statement, unless some Senator wishes to ask a question, I ask for a vote upon the report.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if the conference report preserves the other regulations now existing with reference to pawnbrokers except as to the rate.

Mr. CURTIS. That question was discussed in the conference. A majority of the conferees thought that it did cover them and that the existing law would apply, only changing the rate of interest which might be charged by the pawnbrokers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It has been reported to me that the commissioners and practically all of the civic societies here in the city of Washington are opposed to this bill, not because it puts the loan sharks out of business but because it will put the pawnbrokers out of business. I should like to ask the opinion of the Senator in reference to that statement.

Mr. CURTIS. I think that statement goes too far. It is true that representatives of a large number of organizations appeared before members of the committee and urged the committee not to consent that the pawnbrokers should be included, and asked if there was any legislation in regard to pawnbrokers that it should be applied to the existing law. But after considerable discussion and several meetings it was found that no agreement could be reached upon the loan-shark bill unless the pawnbrokers were included. Therefore the conferees on the part of the Senate consented to that, and their action was indorsed by a vote of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would it be a fact, as is charged, that this limitation to 1 per cent would result simply in a sale always of pledges, and that poor men, men who have very little property to put up as a pledge, would thus be denied a privilege which they claim is very dear to them?

Mr. CURTIS. There has been organized within a year in the District of Columbia a company that is now loaning money at 6 per cent, or rather 6 per cent discount, and the officers and managers of that company informed members of the committee that they are ready to continue loans at that rate. Some members of the committee thought that the interest charged by the pawnbrokers, where they had security, 36 per cent, was entirely too large. With this new company and others who are doing a loaning business, and with the information that the committee had in reference to business done by companies in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other large cities, it was believed those who desired small loans would be accommodated. This one company is now doing business and other companies can be organized, and money can be loaned here at 6 and 8 per cent; at any rate, at a lower rate than is permitted in this bill, which allows them to charge 12 per cent, or 1 per cent a month.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the new company to which the Senator refers loan money on personal property as security?

Mr. CURTIS. I understand they have made loans on personal property or even upon the notes of individual members of the family.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How do they differ from ordinary pawnbrokers?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not tell you that. I do not know about their security. The matter was brought to my attention a few days ago, but I did not inquire extensively into how they are doing business.

I ask for a vote, Mr. President, on the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the close of the session last evening the question of the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Monday, January 20, 1913, at 3 o'clock upon the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases was under discussion, and I asked that it be resubmitted to the Senate and gave a short statement as to why it should be. I again, Mr. President, ask that that question be resubmitted to the Senate.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that the RECORD shows it was presented to the Senate in an unusual way. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] did not ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the order. He simply stated, "I present the following," and then it was read by the Secretary of the Senate.

I heard the Presiding Officer make the statement, "Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered." I immediately rose to my feet and addressed the Chair, but his attention was drawn to the other side of the Chamber, and he recognized the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I rose for the purpose of objecting and giving my reasons why. I have already stated to the Senate how it happened. I was in the Senate at the time the unanimous consent was passed upon, and before any other business had been attended to I addressed the Chair.

Mr. President, under the circumstances I ask that the question be resubmitted to the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to say in connection with this matter that it seems to me the Senate is establishing a very dangerous precedent in opening the door to a means by which a majority of the Senate at any time can practically nullify a unanimous-consent rule. It has been urged, I do not know whether on the floor of the Senate, that if this order stands there are Senators who will disregard it. I think that possible danger of far less importance to the Senate than the step it is proposed to take, which would open a way to set aside a unanimous-consent agreement.

It happened yesterday morning that I came into the Senate. The President pro tempore had to take charge at 1 o'clock of the impeachment proceedings, and he usually has some one occupy the chair while he secures a lunch. He happened to ask me to occupy the chair. It is needless to say that I knew nothing whatever of any proposed unanimous-consent request, but upon taking the chair the Senator from Tennessee sent the request to the desk. The Chair directed the reading of the request, which the Secretary did, announcing in the reading that the Senator from Tennessee was asking for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that statement is absolutely correct; but the Senator from Minnesota, who was the Presiding Officer at the time, will remember that he made this statement:

> Let the Chair say a word. There is too much confusion in the Senate. This unanimous-consent offer was made, was read very clearly and with great deliberation by the Secretary, and stated with deliberation by the Chair. The trouble is there is too much confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. CLAPP. I will reach that in chronological order in my statement. I think those who were in the Senate yesterday morning when this unanimous consent was asked for will bear out that the Secretary of the Senate read it with care and with deliberation. The request or suggestion as to whether there was objection was made with much more deliberation than some requests which have been submitted to-day. After the statement that the Chair heard no objection, there was a pause and then the usual order, "It is so ordered." After that the Senator from Utah addressed the Chair; but the Chair did not see him, and recognized the Senator from Oklahoma. Upon the completion of the business proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, the Senator from Utah obtained the floor and asked whether the Senate had been considering a request for unanimous consent, and was advised that it had just passed upon that kind of a request. The Senator then suggested a reconsideration of the vote. The Chair held that there could be no reconsideration of a vote fixing a unanimous consent; that an agreement for unanimous consent could not be changed, modified, or set aside even by unanimous consent after it was made. The rule for that has already been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and requires, it seems to me, at my hands no discussion.

Subsequently, and I might say generally, if I may be permitted to say it without a seeming reflection, the Chair stated that there was too much confusion. There is too much confusion too often upon the floor of the Senate. If the Senator from Utah had suggested, or if it had been suggested to the Chair at that time that he resubmit the question, a different question might have been presented. The controversy, and no one was to blame for that, turned at once upon the right of the Senate to deal with a unanimous-consent agreement after it had been made. After that question had been discussed pro and con for some time, then the suggestion was made that the subject matter be resubmitted to the Senate.

Now, Senators, this is simply my own view—every man is entitled to his own; every man can settle these questions for himself—but it seems to me that if this unanimous-consent agreement can be set aside, not by a direct vote to reconsider it, not by a vote to set it aside, but upon the plea that it was not in fact adopted, you are establishing a very dangerous precedent; you are getting into a twilight zone where there is no well-defined line that can be laid down either by the Senate or by the Presiding Officer.

I do not know that anyone has questioned the fairness of the matter. It is a matter I do not care to discuss. I say again that the then occupant of the chair had no suggestion that the Senator from Tennessee was going to submit a request, nor did he know what the request was until it was read from the desk, and then the Chair proceeded with deliberation. Clearly no one could claim that he was taken by surprise or that any advantage was taken of him.

I want to say again, it appears to me that if by this means, in this instance, while it may seem perhaps a hardship, although it is not a vote, it is not decisive of anything except that some day the Senate will vote upon a measure, if a unanimous-consent agreement can be set aside upon this ground we are making a precedent and opening a dangerous pathway to the modification and setting aside of unanimous-consent agreements. For one I shall feel constrained to vote against resubmitting this matter to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the objects and purposes of this bill. If I had been here yesterday, I should have made no objection whatever to the unanimous-consent agreement.

I venture to take the floor for a few moments because there seems to be much more involved here than anything affecting a single measure. The business of the Senate is largely transacted through unanimous-consent agreements, not only the important unanimous-consent agreements which are reached often with much difficulty on large and generally contested measures, but constantly on all the small business of the Senate we depend on unanimous consent to enable us to transact the public business. We do it in executive session, and we do it in legislative session. We have never put any restraint upon it. We have never fixed any time, as is done in the House, when a unanimous-consent agreement can be asked.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me, after listening to the debate on this subject, as if there was more or less misconception, misapprehension perhaps, on the part of some Senators as to the nature of a unanimous-consent agreement. It has no recognition in the rules at all. It is no more within the control of the Chair than the maintenance of a pair is in the control of the Chair. The chair when occupied by Mr. Frye, who was high authority, stated the position of the Chair, once for all, that he had no power to enforce a unanimous-consent agreement any more than he had power to enforce a pair. A unanimous-consent agreement is something that rests absolutely and entirely on the will and the good faith of Senators themselves, just like a pair.

If any number of Senators choose, or if one Senator chooses, to say that any unanimous consent was improperly obtained, that there never was a unanimous consent, and a Senator declines to observe it, there is no power on earth that can prevent his taking the floor and carrying that unanimous consent over so that it becomes void and of no effect.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have always felt since I have been in the Senate the greatest anxiety that we should preserve, in the first place, most absolutely unanimous-consent agreements, without modification, without amendment. They certainly can not be reconsidered; they can not be modified. I do not think that they can be vacated by another unanimous consent, unless you can be assured that every Senator who consented was present when the original unanimous consent was asked to be vacated, and that is practically out of the question. I do not believe there is anyone in the Senate who has more strongly felt the importance for the transaction of the Senate business that unanimous-consent agreement should be most strictly observed than I have.

I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] that it would be a very dangerous precedent to establish if we should set aside unanimous-consent agreement in any way. I have no doubt of the right of the Chair to resubmit it. I have very grave doubt as to whether we can order its resubmission by a vote of the Senate.

As to the Chair's right to resubmit, it has been done again and again. I regret that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who has had a longer experience than almost any other Senator in this body, who is an experienced parliamentarian, should, as I see by the RECORD, differ with me on that practice.

The present occupant of the chair agreed with me about it, and I think there is no question as to the fact. Of course this is all a matter of practice. There is no rule to guide us. But where the Chair saw that any Senator had not had an opportunity to make objection, had not been recognized, I do not think any occupant of the chair has ever hesitated to resubmit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. President, within the memory of living men, I have seen a motion made by the Senator from Texas and in the course of discussion lost sight of, and another motion offered and submitted by the Chair, and on his attention being called to the fact that the original motion had been overlooked he acknowledged the oversight and submitted the original motion.

Nobody can occupy that chair, and in the confusion which often happens on the floor, fail to occasionally overlook some Senator who rises for the purpose of objection or make some slight mistake about the order of motions; and it is impossible to suppose that the Chair is not to have the right and has not the right to resubmit, as he has the right to submit, if he is satisfied in his own mind that any Senator present and on the floor has been by his action deprived of his undoubted right and power to give assent.

Admitting, Mr. President, the danger of establishing a precedent by modifying a unanimous-consent agreement, there is also another danger which I think equally great and which I think should be just as much guarded against if we wish to preserve, as I do, unanimous-consent agreements as essential to the transaction of the business. The idea must never for a moment be allowed that a unanimous-consent agreement was passed by mistake or error, was a snap judgment, or that any Senator who was present on the floor was deprived of his opportunity to give or withhold his assent.

I was not present yesterday, and I speak only from what appears in the RECORD. It appears by the RECORD that an order was sent by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] to the desk. In somewhat long experience here no doubt there may have been many such, but I do not recall an instance of a Senator seeking a unanimous-consent agreement and not asking for it himself. The Senator in charge of the bill or the Senator interested in the bill, great or small, makes the request himself. If he chooses, as he has an undoubted right to do, to put his unanimous-consent request in the form of an order, it comes in undoubtedly in order under the last subject in the call of morning business; that is, concurrent and other resolutions.

This was offered, I see by examining the RECORD, during the order of the introduction of bills. It was sent to the desk without any remark being made by the Senator from Tennessee, and he was not bound to make any remark. It was then read from the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not the custom whenever a request for unanimous consent is made to call attention to it from the floor and to explain it before it is sent to the desk?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is never safe to indulge in a universal negative, but I do not recall an instance of a unanimous-consent agreement being asked for that was not asked for from the floor, and usually the unanimous-consent agreement is asked for and is put in form by the clerks at the desk. I do not say that except to show that the method, although absolutely legitimate, was not usual.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question there?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I read the RECORD, as the Senator from Massachusetts has done, and I note that the order was sent to the desk and was reported by the Secretary, and I do not think, if my memory serves me, that even the request for the present consideration of it at that time was asked for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was not.

Mr. LODGE. It was not. Of course it was out of order at that time, except by unanimous consent. There was no request made for its consideration at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ought there not to have been a request for the suspension of the regular order to admit it, and——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just let me finish the question. And had not the Senators on the floor the right to suppose that nothing but new bills would be read, unless the order of business was suspended?

Mr. LODGE. Strictly speaking, under that order of the introduction of bills, of course nothing but the introduction of bills is in order, and, strictly speaking, the request for consideration was the proper step to take. But it is only fair to say that unanimous-consent agreements are habitually asked for at all times during a session.

My point is that there was neither a request for its present consideration nor was the unanimous consent asked for; but an order was sent to the desk containing a request for unanimous consent. It was laid before the Senate by the Chair without, as I recall, asking whether there was objection to its consideration at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is never asked, and never was asked.

Mr. LODGE. Well, I think it is pretty hard to indulge in such absolute statements as that it was never asked. I have been here some time and I have heard it asked a great many times. I have heard it asked from the Chair over and over again, "Is there objection to consideration at this time?" I should be inclined to think my friend from New Hampshire had made that inquiry from the Chair himself a good many times.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I never knew an instance where, when a unanimous-consent agreement was proposed, the Chair asked whether or not it would be allowed to be considered, and I——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my point is that unanimous consent was not proposed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, of course, the Senator and I differ on that, and I will state my views after he gets through.

Mr. LODGE. Well, it was not proposed according to the RECORD. Of course, I was not here, and I can only quote the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me just a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find here just below where the Secretary read the request for unanimous consent that the Presiding Officer said:

> Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LODGE. That is not what I am referring to. I am referring to a request for its consideration out of order. Strictly speaking it was not in order at all then. Nothing was in order at that time but the introduction of bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill on the calendar would have been in order.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly if it was made; but my point is that it was not made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unanimous-consent agreements have been asked at any stage of our proceedings.

Mr. LODGE. So I have said.

Mr. GALLINGER. To my knowledge for 21 years I never heard the question raised before that such requests were out of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I said that it was habitual to ask unanimous consent at any stage of the proceedings in the Senate, but not strictly under the rules. I do not think, however, it can be disputed that no business is in order during the time for the introduction of bills except the introduction of bills. If other business is offered, it must be by motion or request.

If a Senator reports a bill from a committee and asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, the Chair always first asks the Senate if they will give consent to the consideration of the bill at that time, and that it is a unanimous consent that is being asked for. In this case the order was read. The Presiding Officer then made the usual inquiry:

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

And then I see the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] addressed the Chair and said: "Mr. President," and Mr. OWEN was recognized. That is all that the RECORD discloses.

Mr. President, the point that is made by the Senator from Utah is that he failed to get recognition from the Chair when he was entitled to it; that his consent was never given; that he was on the floor; that he tried to get recognition and failed; and that he has been deprived of his right of withholding or giving his consent. Other Senators who were present at the time, I find by reading over the debate, arose in their places and said they did not consider themselves bound by the unanimous consent just given. That is the point on which I wish to lay stress. The whole virtue and merit of the unanimous-consent agreements, the qualification without which it can not continue, is that all Senators shall admit that they are fairly and properly given and shall feel themselves bound by them. If Senators do not feel themselves bound by a unanimous-consent agreement, it makes no matter what the Senate does, the unanimous consent given falls to the ground.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the RECORD shows that the Senator from Utah was the first Senator to address the Chair immediately following the reading of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I intended to point out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, but, Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon just one interruption, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has made a mistake in his statement.

Mr. LODGE. No; he has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah did not rise immediately after the reading. The Senator from Utah rose after the Chair had put the request and had decided that there was no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which is a totally different thing.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator from Ohio said that the Senator from Utah arose immediately after the Secretary had read the statement.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; he arose immediately after the words "It is so ordered" had been spoken.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. I desire, in justice to the position which is taken by the Senator from Utah, to confirm from my own knowledge and recollection just what the facts were. I was sitting very near the Senator from Utah and was paying attention to what was going on. I was looking and listening for an objection to be made to the consideration of this order, and I am able to say of my own knowledge that the Senator from Utah did address the Chair first, but the attention of the Chair was directed to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and he was recognized; but, as a matter of fact, the Senator from Utah did first address the Chair, and addressed him twice or three times, and loudly; I might say rather frantically.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, that confirms the testimony of the RECORD.

Mr. President, I would say, as one who is in sympathy with the bill and who would not have objected to the unanimous-consent agreement, that I think it is a very unfortunate thing, however our opinions may differ as to questions of practice involved, to have a unanimous-consent agreement in regard to which any considerable number of Senators, or any number, great or small, feel that it was not properly obtained. I do not mean by improper methods, but I mean that they feel that it was not obtained with the consent of those whose consent was necessary. The question involved here is, whether that consent exists; not whether it shall be held. Nobody can hold it; there is no power to compel Senators to obey that unanimous-consent agreement. It all rests on our own good faith and our own adhesion to the rules of the Senate; and it would be just as unfortunate, in my mind, to force a unanimous-consent agreement about which there was any doubt or about which Senators felt that they had not been fairly treated—it would be just as bad as to tamper with or modify or try to upset a unanimous-consent agreement fairly and properly obtained. I think one would be just as prejudicial to our system of unanimous-consent agreements as would the other.

I do not want to see in the Senate what I think will be very likely to grow out of this—some strict limitation put upon obtaining unanimous-consent agreements as used to be done in the other House. I can not speak of their rules at present; but I think they have, certainly they formerly had, set times when unanimous consents could be asked, and they could not be asked for at other times. I do not want to see those restrictions put upon the Senate. I think it is one of the great merits and advantages of this body that we have so much freedom and latitude, but the price we must pay for it is a very careful observance of all the necessary conditions to make a unanimous-consent agreement consented to by everybody.

Mr. President, I may differ with other Senators on this point, but I do not think the Senate has power to compel the resubmission of the question by vote. Unless provided for in the rules, as in the case of messages and conference reports, I think the matter of resubmitting a question to the Senate is one that must rest within the discretion of the Chair. Of course, it is in the power of any number of Senators or of any Senator to reduce this unanimous-consent agreement to nothing. It exists only by the willingness of Senators; it has no other power, no other strength. It is for that reason that I sincerely hope that those who are interested in preserving the unanimous-consent agreement will see that a unanimous consent about which Senators feel, as many Senators obviously do feel in this case, may be perfectly worthless, and in any event would establish a precedent which would make it infinitely more difficult to obtain other unanimous-consent agreements and might throw a cloud over the whole system and lead to restrictions which, I think, would be most unfortunate.

I am not speaking, Mr. President, in the least in the interest of this bill or against it. As I have twice before said, I sympathize with the purposes of the bill. I should have agreed to the unanimous consent; but I do feel deeply about the importance of preserving the system of unanimous-consent agreements, so that on the one hand every Senator shall realize, when once they have been properly obtained, that they can not be modified or tampered with or affected by anybody or in any way; and on the other hand that they shall always be obtained in such manner that no Senator who was present can question the fact that his consent was obtained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had not intended to say another word about this matter, but the rather extraordinary speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] leads me to make an observation or two.

The Senator from Massachusetts made rather an adroit argument, but I think it is founded entirely on false principles. Before proceeding, however, Mr. President, I will ask what is before the Senate? I was out of the Chamber when this discussion commenced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not recall whether or not the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a distinct motion, as there was so much confusion in the Chamber at the time. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Utah——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, what has become of the point of order which I made yesterday and which was pending when we then adjourned?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter has been renewed this morning. No motion which was then pending——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, but there was a point of order which I made which was pending. The point of order was distinctly made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole proceeding fell with the adjournment of the Senate. It was not the unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I will renew the point of order in a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was my understanding, Mr. President, and it was for that reason that I asked what was before the Senate before proceeding with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Utah whether or not he made any distinct motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not put it in the form of a motion, but I asked that the question of unanimous consent be resubmitted to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, without going into details, I renew the point of order which I made yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not yield the floor; no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed, then.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is an extraordinary proposition that, after a matter is settled, in one day thereafter the Presiding Officer can resubmit the question. If it can be done one day afterwards, it can be done a month afterwards. We might have a unanimous-consent agreement standing on our calendar, and one week or two weeks or three weeks afterwards some Senator might find fault and state that it got there improperly, and ask the Chair to resubmit it. I think it is a very extraordinary proposition, and, in my judgment, it can not properly be done.

Mr. President, I will turn to the RECORD concerning the procedure in this instance. It is idle for Senators to argue that a unanimous-consent agreement can not be asked for during the morning hour. During 21 years I have seen it done time and time again; and this is the first occasion it has ever been called in question, so that I assume that the time was opportune and the procedure correct. The Senator from Tennessee had, I think, on three former occasions—I will ask him how many times?

Mr. SANDERS. Three times. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. On three former occasions asked for this unanimous consent, and it had been refused. On yesterday, again, the Senator from Tennessee rose in his seat—it is not necessary that a Senator should read a resolution he is going to offer or an order that he is going to offer or a request he is going to make, the Secretary has got to receive it anyway—and sent to the Chair this paper. I now read from the RECORD:

> Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I offer the following.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). It will be read.
> The SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

So it was stated in distinct terms—the clerks at the desk speak very distinctly—that it was a unanimous-consent agreement. The unanimous-consent agreement was then read, and then the Presiding Officer, who likewise has a good voice, inquired:

> Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Now, Mr. President, if that is not a unanimous-consent agreement that ought to stand, I never have known one that ought to have been given consideration by this body.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from New Hampshire calls attention to the fact that the Senator from Tennessee had on several previous occasions asked for the same unanimous-consent agreement. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on all those previous occasions the Senator from Tennessee, having risen in his seat, specifically stated that he asked for a unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is sticking in the bark.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whereas in this case he made no such statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Secretary did. I repeat, that is sticking in the bark, Mr. President; it does not amount to anything at all; it can be done in either one way or the other.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] broke in to say that immediately upon the reading of this consent agreement the Senator from Utah addressed the Chair. Manifestly, the Senator from Utah did not. He did not address the Chair before the Chair's announcement had been made that there was no objection and that the order was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The matter which I wished especially to call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts at the time I was on my feet was that the Senator from Utah was the first to address the Chair after the matter had been disposed of. I think I was not very happy in the expression which I used at the time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I am not through.

Mr. STONE. I desire, if the Senator will permit me, in connection with his remarks to have read a resolution which I intend to propose. He may address himself to it, if he cares to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield for that purpose. Anything that will enlighten us on this subject I welcome.

Mr. STONE. I do not know whether it will enlighten the Senator, but it will serve to bring the matter to a head.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senate, the Secretary will read the resolution intended to be proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Resolved, That the order appearing in the RECORD of January 10, 1913, at page 1328, purporting to fix January 20, 1913, as a day for the consideration and disposition of S. 4043, as by unanimous consent, be, and the same hereby is, vacated and expunged from the RECORD, for the following reason: That the said order was not in fact made by unanimous consent, according to the usual practices of the Senate, and, therefore, was not properly entered in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, with regard to that resolution, ought it not to read "vacated and expunged from the RECORD and the Journal"?

Mr. STONE. Yes; let it be modified in that way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, evidently some revolutionary tactics are to be resorted to now; and I want to give notice, in a very modest way, that if unanimous-consent agreements are to be treated in this manner there will be reprisals. It is very unusual to challenge the fairness and the correctness of a decision made by the Chair. I am not here to defend the distinguished Senator who then occupied the chair; but when it is said that this unanimous-consent agreement has been forced unfairly upon the Senate, it is a pretty serious charge, and had I been in the chair I certainly would resent it very warmly.

Mr. President, I have been here a good while; I have declined always to filibuster on bills; I have held to the opinion that the majority of this body ought to be given an opportunity to vote on every public measure. I have been solicited time and time again to join others in factious opposition to legislation, but I have not done so, and never will do so.

This bill has a history. I believe it was before the Senate prior to the present Congress. At any rate, it was introduced in the Senate during this Congress on December 21, 1911, more than one year ago. Senators have had it before them to consider. It was reported to the Senate on July 23, 1912, almost six months ago, and it has been on the calendar during that time. It is a bill of great public interest. True, there is a diversity of opinion about it. The liquor sellers and the liquor dealers, who have sent me vast volumes of literature on the subject, some of which has been very absurd, are against it; certain Senators are against it; and they have good reason, no doubt, for opposing it. On the other hand, there are a great many of our people in favor of this legislation. My own State has passed just such a law. We have a local option law in New Hampshire. A large proportion of towns and some of the cities have voted against licensing the liquor traffic. Immediately upon that law going into effect, the liquor houses in Boston flooded our no-license towns with liquor by express and otherwise. Our people thought it was a great wrong, and they passed a law a few years ago prohibiting that practice, and it is on the statute book to-day. It is proper that I should say that the liquor interests at the present time, while our legislature is in session, are making a strenuous effort to have that law repealed, but I do not think they will succeed.

The pending bill is in accord with that law. It provides that if a State shall, by its laws, prohibit the sale of liquor, it shall not have its territory invaded by parties outside of the State who are engaged in that traffic. It is a wholesome and proper provision, and I think for that reason the bill ought to pass.

We need not have any concealments about this matter, Mr. President. It is not intended that a vote shall be taken on this bill, in my judgment, and if this unanimous-consent agreement is set aside, no vote will be taken on this bill during this Congress.

My desire to see a vote on this measure, as I would desire to see a vote on any other measure of great public concern, is such that I hope no extraordinary procedure will be approved by the Senate, and I trust that the unanimous-consent agreement, which is now printed on our calendar, will be allowed to stand. If it is not allowed to stand, there is nothing in the world to prevent me from taking a good deal of the time of the Senate in claiming that the other unanimous-consent agreement, which is here on the calendar, ought not to remain in force because I was not present when it was made.

I want further to say, Mr. President, that if a Senator who is here in the discharge of his duties neglects to hear an order which has been read and announced by the Secretary to be a unanimous-consent agreement and declared by the Presiding Officer as having been agreed to—if it is to be contended that because a Senator neglected to observe what was going on in the Chamber, he can protest against it and have a unanimous-consent agreement invalidated, there is no reason why I, if I had entered the door just at the conclusion of that agreement or a few moments afterwards, should not have arisen and said, "Mr. President, I was absent; I was in the lobby; I was in my committee room; but had I been present I would not have agreed to that unanimous-consent agreement, and I ask that it shall be resubmitted." Of course, resubmission carries with it the suggestion that it will not be agreed to.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that it is important that we shall deal fairly with each other, and that in the matter of unanimous-consent agreements we shall be careful not to do anything that is irregular or that is contrary to our rules or that is unusual; but in this case I can not, for the life of me, see anything that was irregular, contrary to our rules, or unusual. The unanimous-consent agreement stands on our calendar, and, in my judgment, it would be a great mistake if it were stricken off, because if it should be, Mr. President, requests for unanimous consent will in the future be scanned more closely than they have been heretofore, and it will not be so easy to secure unanimous-consent agreements as it has been in the past. Many unanimous-consent agreement of which I did not approve have been made in my absence; but I have never thought it was my privilege to come in here 24 hours after or 24 seconds after they had been made and say that if I had been present I would have objected to them, and demand, or request, that they be resubmitted, so that I might have the privilege of objecting.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not think that I suggested that I was unfairly treated. I was absent from the Senate on a conference at the time the request was made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I so understood.

Mr. LODGE. And, of course, even if I had been against the unanimous-consent agreement, which I was not, I had no claim whatever, and there never has been any suggestion from anybody that a Senator who was absent from the Senate has any right to object to a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not charge that the Senator had made that suggestion. I made it on my own responsibility.

Mr. LODGE. I only said to the Senator that I did not suppose he included me in that suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly did not. Now, Mr. President, I do not think it is competent for the Senate to change this agreement; I do not think it is competent for the Chair to resubmit it, and I very gravely doubt whether or not a resolution such as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] proposes to offer ought to be entertained; but if it is entertained, I trust that it will not be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question before he takes his seat. The RECORD shows that as soon as the Presiding Officer declared that he heard no objection to the request for unanimous consent, and that it was so ordered, the Senator from Utah was on his feet immediately.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In point of fact, he was on his feet before the announcement was concluded, was he not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], that is additional corroboration of the RECORD and of my statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Connecticut is addressing me, so I am still entitled to the floor, I presume. If the Senator from Utah was on his feet at such an early stage, he certainly could have said "I object" as well as he could have said anything else, but he did not do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I did not say that he was on his feet when the Chair made the announcement. What I say is that the RECORD shows that as soon as the Presiding Officer said that he heard no objection, and that the unanimous consent was ordered, immediately the next thing the RECORD discloses is that the Senator from Utah addressed the Chair and said, "Mr. President." Now, what I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire is: Supposing that the Chair had recognized the Senator from Utah, in accordance with his earnest request to be recognized, would, then, the Senator from New Hampshire say that the Chair could not have restated the question if the Senator from Utah had said that he wanted to object?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday when the same question was put to me I stated, whether I would have been right or wrong, had I been in the chair I would not have resubmitted it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have in my hand the RECORD of the proceedings at that time, and it seems that some other distinct business intervened.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator cite the page?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Page 1324.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator proceed and state what intervened?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] introduced a bill to amend the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is mistaken, I am quite sure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was because the Chair did not recognize the Senator from Utah. The RECORD shows that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said "Mr. President" first, and tried to get the ear of the Chair, and was on his feet; but the Chair looked over in this direction and recognized the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Utah was on his feet and tried to be heard before the Chair finished his statement. The Senator from Utah not having heard the agreement, but hearing what the Chair was saying, was on his feet for recognition.

I expect to vote for the Kenyon bill, and I am willing to give consent that it shall be considered just as soon as possible, but it does not seem to me that there was clearly any unanimous-consent agreement in this case. I do not think there was any unanimous consent given in this case. I think the Chair was mistaken about it. The Senator from Utah was on his feet asking for recognition when the announcement was finished.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SMOOT, and others addressed the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am willing to yield to any Senator for a question, but I would like to conclude my statement, which is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor. He will proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Washington wish me to yield to him further?

Mr. POINDEXTER. For just a moment, in order that I may complete the statement. The RECORD does show that before any objection was made by the Senator from Utah the intervening business took place. The RECORD shows that the Senator from Utah addressed the Chair. But he made no objection; he made no statement to the Chair as to what was his purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not; I had not been recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He did not have a chance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield the floor if necessary, although I did want to conclude my statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. I can make my statement later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not claim that the Senator from Utah objected. The Senator from Washington has misapprehended me if he understood me so to claim. I do claim that the minute the Presiding Officer stated "It is so ordered"—I read from the RECORD—the next thing in the RECORD is:

> Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

He did not object, because he was not recognized by the Chair and could not object.

Then the RECORD shows that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] was recognized and introduced a bill. And then, within three lines, Mr SMOOT came right back and he asked—

> Was there a unanimous-consent agreement just entered?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was; just agreed to.
> Mr. SMOOT. I know that there are a number of Senators out of the Chamber.

And so forth.

Now, that shows that the Senator from Utah, immediately upon the announcement by the Chair that it had been agreed to, was addressing the Chair for the purpose of stating that he objected to it.

Of course, I assume that no one claims that the unanimous consent was obtained unfairly. I do not think it was. But I think it was obtained in an unusual manner, and certain Senators think, inasmuch as it was obtained in a way so that Senators did not understand it, that it was not in fact a unanimous consent; that the minds of the Senators who were supposed to have consented to it never met, and that there was not in fact a unanimous consent, although the RECORD shows that it was agreed to.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Only a short time ago I made the statement that I would not like the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to pass without challenge. The Senator from Utah did not address the Chair before the final order was made. But immediately after and before the Chair was addressed by the Senator from Oklahoma, he addressed the Chair. Those are the facts I am quite sure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is corroborated, as I recollect it, by the statement that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made yesterday, that at the time the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] had diverted his attention by addressing to him a question, and that as soon as his attention was called to the fact that this matter was on he tried to object and was not allowed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. So that it will be perfectly clear I wish to say this: It is true that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] was directing a question to me, and my attention was momentarily diverted, as I stated yesterday. The only words I heard the Presiding Officer say were, "The Chair hears none. It is so ordered." I did hear those words, and I knew that those words were only used in the case of a unanimous-consent agreement. I did not know what the unanimous-consent agreement was, but I knew there was one, and I immediately—after it was announced by the Chair, "It is so ordered"—I said: "Mr. President;" just as the Senator from California has stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have said, Mr. President, that while nobody claims that this consent was obtained unfairly, it was obtained under unusual circumstances.

It has been stated here that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] had several times before made this same request, or a similar one; but that the conditions under which the requests were made before were entirely different from those at the time this request was granted. When the Senator made his request, before he stood in his place on the floor, as will appear on page 1256 of the RECORD, and stated as follows:

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Petitions and memorials are in order. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, on last Monday I asked unanimous consent that the bill to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up next Monday. Objection was made, * * *——

The Senator himself, standing in his place, goes on for the equivalent of 3 inches of space in the RECORD explaining what the matter was for which he asked present consideration and unanimous consent. Now, what happened yesterday was simply this:

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I offer the following:

Then he sends the paper to the desk. He does not say, which is the usual custom at least, "Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following order which I send to the desk." He simply said, "I send the following——"

Mr. GALLINGER. Read what the Secretary said.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the Presiding Officer——

Mr. GALLINGER. No; read what the Secretary said.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Presiding Officer said:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). It will be read.

And then:

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement.

If a Senator knows it to be a unanimous-consent agreement, stated by the Senator himself, it might excite his attention; but when the Senator does not say it is to be a unanimous-consent agreement, as he had done previously on other days, but simply sends the paper up, and a Senator sits here talking with another Senator, and here is the Secretary reading something, it seems to me that that procedure does not put Senators, who are supposed to give their positive and active consent to the proposition, upon their guard as the other course of procedure would tend to.

Yesterday I made the statement upon this question that it seemed to me that if the request for a resubmission of the unanimous-consent agreement had been made at once it ought to have been granted, but that I thought after eight hours had gone by it was late to grant it, because if it could be granted after that interval of time had elapsed there was no limit at the end of which it might not be granted. But on thinking the matter over and recalling the circumstances of yesterday's proceedings, it appears that the entire hour between the time the unanimous consent had been agreed to and the time the Impeachment Court came in at 1 o'clock was occupied by the Senator from Utah in attempting to enforce his right to make objection to this request. Then he was swept off his feet by the previous order of the Senate as to the impeachment proceedings, and as soon as the Impeachment Court adjourned for the day he took it up again, and for the whole day labored to obtain what, upon such attention as I have been able to give to it, was, I think, the right of any Senator, if we are all to treat each other fairly and if unanimous-consent agreements are really and in fact to be what they purport to be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. The Senator says that it has become a sort of a custom for the Chair, when a Senator arises immediately after the Chair has announced a result like this and says he did not understand it, to resubmit the question. I want to ask the Senator if he ever knew a resubmission to be made under circumstances like those, except in the form of a request for unanimous consent itself? In other words, does not the Chair uniformly say, "The Senator from A. B., not having heard the matter just passed upon, the Chair will, without objection, resubmit it"? Did you ever know it to be done in any other way? And that very form is putting another request for unanimous consent in order to reverse a former one.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, even that was not done. Even that was not said by the Presiding Officer. He did not say, "The Chair will again submit this matter, if there is no objection," because it did not appear to the Chair that the Senator from Utah had risen to make an objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Connecticut misunderstands me. I am talking not about this case but about cases where the Chair does resubmit. Did the Senator ever know the Chair to resubmit except in this form, "The Chair will, without objection, resubmit it," and the very phrase "without objection" is a request for unanimous consent. I ask the Senator if he ever knew it to be put in any other way? I never did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not remember at this minute a specific instance that I can now find in the RECORD, for I have no time to look up whether unanimous consents have been resubmitted in the past and, if they have, in what form of language they have been submitted by the Chair; but I do remember on all sorts of matters continuously in this Senate when the Chair has declared the Senate has acted this way or that way, and any Senator has doubted it or said he did not know what was the question the Senate was voting on and asked to have the question resubmitted to the Senate, it is universally done, and the Chair does not even ask the consent of the Senate. It is always said by the Chair, "The Chair will again state the question."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember ever having heard it put except that the Chair would, without objection, resubmit. Certainly the Chair would not have any right to do so of its own motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to suggest this——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Chair has not yet had a chance to say that he will resubmit it to the Senate, because it has been discussed here every minute that there has been a chance to discuss it from the time I first arose until the present time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, Mr. President, very justly so, because I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire that entirely irrespective of the bill about which the unanimous-consent agreement was had it involves the possibility of the transaction of business by the Senate in its whole future, for almost all the business that is crowded up here at the end of a busy session can only be put through by unanimous-consent agreements, and if they are to be played fast and loose with, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, we would be in chaos.

But this is a case which will be quoted as a precedent, no doubt, in the future. As I say, I would not, after Senators, some of whom had been on the floor and had agreed to the request for unanimous consent, had left the Chamber—I would not, after several hours had elapsed, or after a considerable period of time had elapsed, consent that one Senator might get up and ask to have the request resubmitted, because the Senator who had secured the consent may have left the city on a train on the assumption that the bill or the matter about which the agreement was made would not be acted upon until the day agreed to, and would be acted upon then.

But this case seems to me to constitute an exception to anything that I have been familiar with. A Senator immediately gets upon his feet and addresses the Chair, as the Senator from California says, three or four times, and almost frantically, and fails to obtain recognition, and as soon as he can recur to it goes at it again, and the whole day yesterday, except the time taken by the impeachment proceedings, was consumed by that Senator in trying to get the matter resubmitted; and the same way to-day.

Now, the only reason I have made this statement is that I intend to vote, if the Chair submits to the Senate the question whether it will be resubmitted or not, to resubmit it; and I want to explain the change in my views on that subject, which had occurred since I expressed them yesterday.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have listened with some attention to what has been said by Senators on this subject. In the light of all that has been said I am entirely convinced that this matter should be resubmitted to the Senate, for the simple and sole reason that it has been disclosed to my satisfaction—and that accords with my personal knowledge—that the Senator from Utah had it in mind to object to the unanimous consent which was asked, and that he was deprived of the opportunity without any fault of his own and while he was discharging his duties on this floor, and in a transaction to which I was a party.

I am in favor of some such legislation as the Kenyon bill, and I think the request preferred by the Senator from Tennessee was an entirely reasonable one and ought to be agreed to now, and I know he did nothing wrong either in the manner of making the application for unanimous consent or anything that transpired before or subsequent to it. It was just one of those cases where the unusual happened, and the Senator from Utah found himself at a disadvantage in consequence of it. Under the generous law of courtesy that prevails here he ought to be put back into the possession of his rights to be exercised as he would have exercised them had his duties not diverted him for a moment.

I think I see a purpose here not to consider this bill as promptly as it should be considered, but it will be considered, and it will be considered, too, without violating the proprieties of this Chamber in taking advantage of an order which has been entered when it would not have been made had fuller knowledge of what was going on and an opportunity to object been afforded.

I do not think we accomplish anything by undertaking to avail ourselves of snap judgment on anybody. There has never in my experience here been denied to a Senator the right to explain why he did not do this, that, or the other. Such an instance seldom arises. The exceptional instance has come now, when the Senator from Utah has stated that by an attempt to discharge his duties at the request of another Senator he was deprived of a right which he desired to exercise, and I happen to know personally that that statement is true, if it is necessary to support any statement which he might make. I do not believe it is. But I simply state that fact in order to emphasize the circumstances that this is not a unanimous-consent agreement. Nothing is unanimous consent until unanimously consented to, and that consent can not be given until everybody understands what he is consenting to. That state of facts does not exist.

So I think the proper thing for the Senate to do is to reopen the question, so that it will be just as it was when the Senator from Utah had his attention diverted. I think we will better conform to the general spirit of fairness which prevails in this Chamber by doing that. We can take our chances of getting a vote on this bill. Laws are written because they are laws and they are not laws because they are written. That axiom still exists. If it is right, public opinion will force its recognition, and no sort of indirection will prevent it here.

The law of courtesy and fairness that prevails here is the best protection we have in the discharge of our duty. We can do better under that régime or under that benign influence than we can do in any other way; and simply and solely because I know the Senator from Utah was deprived of the right he was entitled to exercise by circumstances over which he had no control I unite with those who say that the matter should be resubmitted at this time.

I want also to add that when the matter is submitted again, if the time limit proposed is too short, while some fair limit should be fixed, there ought to be a time fixed when a vote on the bill shall be taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order in regard to the matter offered by the Senator from Missouri. Upon yesterday——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is that submitted by the Senator from Utah. The resolution of the Senator from Missouri was read for information. The question before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Utah that the application for unanimous consent be again submitted to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Then I make the point of order against that request. The point of order is that a unanimous-consent agreement made by the Senate and declared by the Chair to have been made can not be repealed except by unanimous consent. I do not care to argue it. I argued it yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is no rule of the Senate in regard to unanimous-consent agreements. There is no rule which provides for a unanimous-consent agreement, nor is there any rule which provides in what way a unanimous-consent agreement may be set aside. It is not one of the rules of the Senate. It is simply a practice voluntarily pursued by the Senate, absolutely within the control of the Senate to observe and regard, or to disregard. It is entirely with the Senate, and not a matter of parliamentary law, nor is it a matter arising under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I do not contend that unanimous-consent agreements are under the rules of the Senate. There is just one thing that any body of men—whether a parliamentary body or a business body, or whether it is a voluntary or accidental meeting of three men—can do at all times, and that is unanimously to agree to do a certain thing. For that very reason no rule governs the question of unanimous consent. It is a mere question of common sense, and the common sense of it is that no body of men can ever be so helpless, so idiotic, as not to have the power to do a thing if all of them agree to do it.

If a majority of men can do a thing, a fortiori all of them can do it. It needed no rule to give the Senate the right to do a thing by unanimous consent, or to give to any other body of men the power by unanimous consent to do a thing within the purview of their jurisdiction, whatever it is.

The common sense of the situation, in the first place—not the rules at all—is that any body of men, including even the United States Senate, and that is putting it pretty strong, can unanimously consent to do a certain thing; and the second point is that, having unanimously agreed to do a certain thing, they can unanimously agree to undo it. The third proposition is that having unanimously agreed to do a thing, having pledged their honors to one another to do it, under the rule—and the rules have nothing to do with it, except that they admit the request for unanimous consent; that is all—that unanimous-consent agreement can not be set aside by any less force than that which created it, to wit, another unanimous-consent agreement.

Now, there are a dozen things that are submitted to the Chair and which are within the power of a body to transact which are provided for by no express rule. It would be stupid for a rule to say that the Senate could unanimously agree. Why should it say a thing that goes without saying? Any three of us meeting on the street corner could unanimously agree to leave the street corner, and then we could unanimously agree to go back to the street corner. So that what the Chair says about the rules has nothing in the world to do with it.

Now, one other thing. I have heard, not only in this body but in another several times, the Chair say: The Member from such-and-such a State or the Senator from such-and-such a State not having understood the question, the Chair will, without objection, resubmit it; but I have never heard the Chair resubmit a question upon the Chair's own volition without giving the body to which it was resubmitted the opportunity to set it aside in precisely the same way in which it had adopted it, to wit, by unanimous consent. The very language, "The Chair will, without objection, resubmit," is itself a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to say that when I was interrogated, I think by the Senator from Connecticut, as to whether, had I been in the chair and the request to resubmit had been made, I would have acceded to it or not, and I said I would not, I meant to add, unless unanimous consent was given for that purpose.

I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that if there is no objection to a resubmission it may properly be made, but if the Chair of his own volition should resubmit a question of that kind, I think it would be not quite proper; and had the request been submitted to the Senate as to whether there was objection to resubmitting it, and had I been in the Chamber I would have objected, and I presume there are 20 others probably who would have objected, too. So we would want to preserve our rights as well as the Senators on the other side desire to preserve theirs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Utah is that the question shall be again submitted to the Senate as to whether unanimous consent shall be granted in this case. As has been previously stated, the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the matter now under discussion originated, and was not even in the Chamber; and for that reason, and for the additional reason, as has been stated on the floor, that it is something which is apt to make a precedent, the Chair prefers that it shall be decided by the Senate.

Therefore the Chair will submit to the Senate the question whether there shall be a resubmission on the ground that there has not been already obtained unanimous consent. The Chair will put it in the form of a question; those who are in favor of the Chair again submitting it will vote in the affirmative and those who are opposed in the negative. The Chair now puts the question: Those who are in favor of the Chair's resubmitting to the Senate the application for unanimous consent will say "aye"; those opposed "no."

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. As many as favor the direction to the Chair to resubmit the question to the Senate will vote "yea" as their names are called. Those who are opposed to such direction being given to the Chair will, as their names are called, answer "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr PENROSE]. I notice that he is not in his seat. If he were present, I should vote "nay." As it is, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not in the Chamber, I will withdraw my vote. If he were present, as already indicated, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is detained from the Senate on official business. I do not know how he would vote were he here.

Mr. SANDERS. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is detained from the Chamber in an unavoidable way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is unavoidably absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I desire again to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of a death in his family.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with that Senator, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 17, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair is instructed by the Senate to submit the question again to the Senate which is involved in the request for unanimous consent sent to the desk by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. The Secretary will again read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, 1913, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent asked?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Utah objects?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, February 10, 1913, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless it is desired that the request shall be read by the Secretary the Chair will put the question, Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What date was fixed?

Mr. GALLINGER. February 10. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill is somewhat of an emergency matter, and I am informed that it was referred to the wrong committee. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I make a unanimous report in favor of Senate joint resolution No. 149, extending the time for the survey, classification, and appraisement of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in Oklahoma, and I submit a report (No. 1097) thereon. This measure was drawn by the Interior Department, and for the reasons explained in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior the committee has made a unanimous report in favor of it. It extends the time within which appraisement can be made, and it is necessary, because the time within which it could be made under a previous statute has expired. It is an important matter locally, will take only a few minutes, and give rise to no debate. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 11, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John Van Schaick, jr., pastor of the Church of Our Father, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art the giver of every good and perfect gift, we lift up unto Thee the voice of our thanksgiving. We praise Thee for the life which Thou hast given us, for the service to which Thou hast appointed us, for the knowledge of Thy will and the inspiration of Thy love; for the work which our hands have found to do, for the truth which we are permitted to learn, for whatever good there has been in our past life, and for the hopes that lead us on to better things. Make us less unworthy of these Thy mercies and Thy blessings, and give us strength to do and dare Thy perfect will; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WICKLIFFE.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, it is ordered that Sunday, the 23d day of February, 1913, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is House bill 27475, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. GARRETT. I make the point of order that that is not the unfinished business for this day under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT. I call the attention of the Chair to clause 3, Rule XXIV. In the new Manual it appears on page 386:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment, except business in the morning hour, shall be resumed as soon as the business on the Speaker's table is finished, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

Now, this is private pension legislation. The fact that it is in an omnibus bill does not in any respect destroy its private character. Under the rule, with which the Speaker is perfectly familiar, and which it is not necessary to read, it is only in order to consider legislation of this character on Fridays. I call the attention of the Chair further to page 386 of the new Manual:

In general, all business unfinished in the general legislative time goes over as unfinished business under the rule—

And so forth. I need not continue the reading of that; but a little further on—

Thus a motion relating to the order of business does not recur as unfinished business on a succeeding day, even though the yeas and nays may have been ordered on it. The question of construction also, when not disposed of at an adjournment, does not recur as unfinished business on a succeeding day.

On the next page, in paragraph 865—

The rule excepts by its terms certain classes of business which are considered in periods set apart for classes of business, viz:
(a) Bills considered in the morning hour for the call of committees.
(b) Bills in Committee of the Whole.
(c) Private bills considered on Fridays.
(d) District of Columbia bills.
(e) Bills brought up under the rule setting apart days for motions to suspend the rules.

And in that connection, Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, on last Monday there was pending a proposition to suspend the rules, and the House was proceeding to vote upon that question when adjournment was taken. That did not come up the next day as unfinished business, but, as I understand, will come up on the next suspension Monday.

Mr. RUSSELL. But in this case the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. FOSTER. The previous question has been ordered on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand the previous question has been ordered on this. The previous question was not ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, because we do not order the previous question on that motion. It does not alter the situation that the previous question has been ordered. The fact of the previous question being ordered does not determine it, but it is determined by the class of business.

The SPEAKER. That bill, as a matter of fact, broke down before the House ever got to the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT. We do not demand the previous question on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is true, but you never did get anywhere with that bill.

Mr. GARRETT. I think the point of no quorum was made, perhaps, but my recollection is that the House was dividing upon the proposition at the time.

The SPEAKER. That was under suspension of the rules, and there is no previous question on that.

Mr. GARRETT. True; but, according to the Manual, bills that are brought up under the rule setting apart a time for motion to suspend the rules do not come up as unfinished business on the following day, but go over until next suspension day, and the Manual places in that same class private bills considered on Friday.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Tennessee considered the question whether the previous question does not change the general plan?

Mr. GARRETT. I have considered it, and I do not think it does change the general principle. I do not think the matter is determined by the parliamentary status of the bill, but by the character of the legislation proposed. I think that is the spirit of the rule. The intention of the Friday rule is to give private bills their opportunity, to give one day in the week on which to consider these bills, or two days in the month, as the case may be. Then, if they have reached a certain parliamentary status, where they can be considered unfinished business, they have their day again when that regular day arrives.

It is not the intention or spirit of the rules to permit private business to have more than it is entitled to under those rules simply by reason of a certain parliamentary stage being reached.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this question was decided as early as the Fifty-second Congress by Speaker Carlisle. He decided that these pension bills, on which the previous question had been ordered on Friday, did come up as unfinished business the next day for public business.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman recollect whether the Friday rule at that time was in the form it is now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only difference was that pension business was considered Friday nights then instead of on Fridays.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I did not find last night in an examination of the precedents the decision to which the gentleman from New York refers. I do not remember what form the rule was in at that particular time, but I do remember in a general way the history of this rule. For a long time it was a special order, not put in the body of the rules of the House. In fact, that may be true up to the beginning of this Congress, but perhaps it was carried into the rules earlier than the beginning of this Congress. But for a long time it was a special order, and there was a provision not only for consideration on Friday but for sessions Friday nights. I do not know what form the rule was in at the time the ruling was made by Speaker Carlisle.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, the old rule was substantially in the form that it is in now, except that it provided for night sessions for the consideration of pension bills. For a long time there was an order changing that and making it day sessions. So far as this point is concerned, I think there was no change in the rule.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Tennessee anything further to suggest?

Mr. GARRETT. Nothing further, Mr. Speaker, except to restate the proposition that, in my judgment, it is the spirit and intention of the rules of the House to give the private bills one day, and that it is not the intention of the rules to permit these bills to take up more than that time.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. On which side is the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I think the point of order should not be sustained.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will not trouble the gentleman. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is a very careful student of the rules, and the Chair dislikes to summarily overrule any point he makes, but this matter has been decided several times, and at least once by Speaker Carlisle, who is universally admitted to be one of the greatest Speakers of the House. It has always been ruled against the contention of the gentleman from Tennessee, and, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated the matter exactly, the line of demarcation is that if the previous question is ordered on Friday it comes up as unfinished business on the next legislative day. If it is not ordered then, it will go over until the next Friday on which the committee has the right of way. The unfinished business is House bill 27475. When the House adjourned last night the previous question had been ordered on the bill and amendments to the final passage. Then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] made a motion to recommit with instructions, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] raised the point of order that the bill was not in the stage where a motion to recommit could be offered, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] made a motion for the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question had never been raised before during the service in the House of the present occupant of the chair, and the practice of the House has been to offer the motion to recommit after the third reading of the bill. On a hasty reading of the rule it seemed to indicate that the motion to recommit might be offered at any time after a bill was reported back to the House, and the rule itself would bear that construction, so the Chair ruled that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] had the right to offer it when he did.

Since that the Chair has investigated the matter and is quite certain that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was right and the Chair was wrong in that ruling and that the motion to recommit is not in order until after the third reading. The Chair makes this statement so that nobody will quote the ruling made last night hereafter as a precedent.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does not the question recur on the roll call on the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. No; that has passed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Has the Speaker put the question whether a separate vote was demanded on any amendment?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to recommit. Without objection, it will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the motion to recommit with instructions.

The Clerk read the motion to recommit, as follows:

Motion by Mr. RODDENBERY:

"I move to recommit H. R. 27475 to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with instructions to report the same back to the House with the following amendment:

"'Strike out the following names from said bill wherever they occur: William Andrew, N. A. Aller, E. B. Silcott, Daniel Wilson, P. L. Kenney, Wilson Murphy, Watson Boyden, William F. Ramsey, G. F. Stamps, M. J. Rengier, L. J. Wilkeson, William F. Mills, William D. Crawford, J. H. Rowland; women, Julia Rouse, Elizabeth Rutherford, Elizabeth Shock, Sarah Jefferson, Leah Jackson, Sarah Garber, Mary Brent, Sarah Sherman, Tilla Eckard.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were 4 ayes and 93 noes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 46, nays 182, answered "present" 10, not voting 146, as follows:

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27148) with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am not inclined to enter into a lengthy discussion of this bill. Indeed, there is very little I desire to say about it, because the report shows the amounts of the estimates in the appropriations in the previous year and the recommendations of the committee this year in each of the departments of the Post Office Department. There is no new legislation in this bill except one or two small features. The committee has thought it best not to increase the salaries of the higher officials nor to place too many men in the grade where the higher officials are, but rather to give an increase in compensation of the laborers and workmen who receive less than $750 a year. We have raised the salary of those lower officials from $650 to $720 and added 150 men to the $840 grade of laborers. There is other new legislation seeking to make the initial salary of clerks $800 instead of $600, the committee being of the opinion that $600 is too low a salary at this time under the present cost of living for any employee of the Government charged with the important duties of the service.

The last Post Office appropriation bill carried $271,429,589. The department's estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, are $281,791,508. The committee has recommended $278,489,781, or less than the department estimates by about $3,000,000. The deficiencies reported this year are about $2,000,000, or a little in excess of the last fiscal year, as far as can be estimated. I shall ask to be placed in the RECORD as part of my remarks a report on this bill giving in detail the appropriation for the year 1913, the estimates for 1914, and the committee recommendations under the present bill in parallel columns.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman if there is anything further done in this bill about the supervisory clerks of the Post Office Department? Last year, upon the recommendation of the department, the committee appropriated for an increase in salary for a number of the supervisory clerks in the larger post offices.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There has been no increase of salaries. There has been an increase in the number of them.

Mr. TILSON. And that is an equivalent to raising the salary of a number of employees?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. In the general promotion scheme.

Mr. TILSON. There has been an increase in the number?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. The gentleman will find in the hearings a rather explicit statement as to the increases and the number of increases will be shown in the tables which you can find in the hearings in detail.

Mr. TILSON. An increase somewhat this year over the year before?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think substantially so.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if this increase of post-office inspectors is sufficient to meet the demand for the establishment of new, and extension of, rural routes? For quite a number of years we have had complaints about failure to give as prompt attention to these applications as should be given, and the reason alleged for it was want of sufficient inspectors to perform the work under the new applications.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We have now 391 inspectors——

Mr. BARTLETT. Three hundred and ninety-five.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Three hundred and ninety-five; but there are four vacancies, I believe. There are 391 inspectors now in the field, as I understand it. We have not increased the number of inspectors, nor have we increased the salary of them. There are some reasons, in the opinion of some of the committee—however, they are not presented and will not be insisted on in this bill—why it is possible that force could be reduced, perhaps later on, 25 or 30 per cent instead of increased.

Mr. BARTLETT. I notice the gentleman in the bill makes especial provision for the services of these men as to the business of investigating——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman is aware that we have been covering in the rural service a number of star routes and will continue to do so. That is in a measure a policy of the department as I understand it. The number of routes I have just forgotten, but there are two hundred and sixty and odd, I believe, that have been established, and perhaps a similar number that are ready to be put into operation. I do not think there is any dearth of inspectors necessary for the purpose of carrying on any of the service—the rural service or any other.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is aware, however, that there has been some just cause for complaint in the delay of establishment of rural routes for several years past?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That may be, but so far as this committee is concerned there is nothing that has come before it that justifies it in bringing any matter of that kind before the House. It is a matter of administration, whether good or bad. It is not for us to determine.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman take into consideration whether or not the new duties of inspectors in appointing fourth-class postmasters would necessitate an increase of duties or the number of inspectors?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; we have not taken that into consideration, and we hope not to be forced to take that into consideration. We hope the good judgment of this House will set aside such a condition ultimately.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman whether in the establishment of rural free delivery routes any information has come to his committee of a greater restriction in the establishment of new routes than ever before by the department?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, the department, as I have said before, has been converting some of the star routes into rural free-delivery routes, but it has not established a great many.

Mr. GARNER. But may I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact, from the information he gets, that the department is not inclined to be as liberal in the establishment of rural free-delivery routes as it was a year or two ago?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think that is true, but whether it is so really or not I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say that, in my judgment, they are not justified in that attitude, because I happen to represent a section of country that is developing very fast, and this policy of the department in holding back and refusing the establishment of rural free-delivery routes is materially injuring the section of country I come from. The older sections of the country, such as the Middle States—Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—have been completely covered, and it seems to be the policy of the department to refrain from establishing rural free-delivery routes in the newer sections of the country wherever it can find any kind of an excuse for refusing.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentlemen interested in this subject will refer to the hearings had before the committee, in the last part of the hearings on the subject of rural routes, commencing on page 93 and following, they will find a detailed statement of the routes in operation, the routes proposed, and the routes discontinued, by States, and the star routes covered into the Rural Service. You will find that we have in operation something over 42,000 of these routes. But I regret to say that if you will refer to the financial reports of the Government you will find a loss to the revenues of the United States on account of the Rural Free Delivery Service for the last fiscal year of something more than thirty millions of money.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will again yield——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. That Congress increased the allowance for rural free-delivery routes over the estimates of the department?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And that the department, in willful violation of the judgment of Congress, refused to expend that money in establishing rural free-delivery routes in the United States, and that it had a considerable surplus of that money left over which went back into the Treasury?

Mr. BARTLETT. It was a million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am advised that that is true.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman think that the Post Office Department has the right, after the matter has been thoroughly discussed, to ignore the judgment of Congress as to the policy of establishing rural free-delivery routes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; of course I do not think the department has the right to ignore the law of the land, but I notice that in the administration of the law the man who has the last construction determines it.

Mr. GARNER. And therefore the executive department's judgment is taken rather than that of the legislative department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is in this affair.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Tennessee will remember that the last time this appropriation bill was before the House the evidence before the committee from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General as to the reason given for the delay was that the inspectors had been occupied mainly with other matters connected with the service than the Rural Free Delivery Service, notably the frauds connected with the postal service?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is so.

Mr. BARTLETT. So that the endeavor is to remedy the cause assigned a year ago?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. So far as legislative action can do so; yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. The gentleman's committee has not increased the pay to the railroads for carrying the mails in this bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No, sir; it has not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the attention of the committee been called to the fact that an increase of expense has been occasioned by reason of the parcel-post law? As I understand, a commission has been appointed, which is now investigating that question; and the committee has not done anything about it, either to reduce or increase it, but awaits the coming of the report of that commission before acting?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia in that connection that that commission which was appointed has not yet acted; that the department submitted to this committee a document, known as Document No. 105, on the subject of railway mail pay, from a study of which it seems that about nine millions of money might be saved to the Government of the United States by the reduction of railway mail pay. But apparently the department has receded from that position, and we are at a loss to know just what reduction, if any, can be made, and consequently we await the action of the commission appointed by Congress on that subject.

But the railroad companies of the United States are demanding strenuously an increase of pay. Only an hour ago a demand was made in our office, for about the third time, that Congress take some action for an immediate annual weighing of the mails, upon which a basis of computation could be founded for pay, on account of the increased service brought about by the matter to be transported by parcel post.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will permit me in this case, I would like to ask him one question, and then I shall not ask him further questions about it. I understand the committee is not in a position to give Congress information, because it is not accessible, as to what would be a just procedure in the reduction or increase of this pay, on account of the fact that the commission has not yet been able to report to Congress?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No. And I will say to the gentleman that there have been heretofore five commissions, and that, when the present one reports, in my opinion the situation will be very much like what it has been heretofore as to the method of computation and the manner of determination of railway mail pay, and the utter inability to get an account and statement annually on the basis of weighing for four years makes it likely that this House will still lack information that would enable it to come within $15,000,000 of what the legitimate pay should be for transporting the mails under the present method of computation. The House and the Congress must sometime provide for some more definite method of payment for the transportation of the mails than that which now exists. That is a question that I want to speak about a little bit later.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I think perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee has not fully answered one point raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and that is that the committee, notwithstanding the commission appointed, has in no way undertaken to add any compensation on account of the parcel post. The parcel post will add very materially to the work of the railroads. The railroads are now demanding that they should have additional pay on account of the additional work they have to perform by reason of the parcel-post law, but that proposition has not been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Georgia has understood, and the House has perhaps understood, that this committee has added nothing in the way of railroad compensation on account of the parcel post, although this bill carries more than three millions of money that has been added to it as the direct result of the parcel post, the details of which I will give later on.

Mr. LLOYD. But not on account of pay to the railroads for transportation of the mails?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; not on account of railway pay for transportation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to take up this discussion for a few moments where I left off when interrupted, I want to say that we have forty-two thousand and some odd rural routes, and we are operating the rural routes of the United States at a loss annually of about $30,000,000.

Under the new law increasing the pay of rural carriers we are now paying $1,100 for a standard route of 24 miles. The bulk of the routes are standard. There are 29,441 routes belonging to that class and 6,832 belonging to the next class, and the grades go down to 440 routes of from 2 to 4 miles.

There are petitions before our committee, containing more than 3,000,000 names, asking for 1-cent letter postage. Of course we all want to get the 1-cent letter postage if it is feasible to do it; but in the rush for that demand on the part of this House, and particularly the other body, certain facts ought to be kept in mind before you go too far in committing yourselves to a policy of that kind. It seems to me that 2 cents is almost little enough for anyone to pay for the carrying of a letter. It is estimated in the department that we have a surplus arising from the 2-cent letter postage of something like $58,000,000. It is therefore argued that the letter writers who produce this great revenue to the Government through this instrumentality ought to have a reduction; in other words, that we ought to take the four divisions of the department, in which money is earned in some and lost in some, and devote the surplus of earnings, where there is a surplus, to a decrease of the postage rates, instead of devoting that surplus to defray the expenses of those divisions of the department which are not earning a profit. We lose $30,000,000 annually on rural delivery. We lose $20,000,000 annually on the carrying of second-class matter at the present rate of 1 cent a pound. By the way, 1 cent a pound is the result of a reduction from 2 cents, as the law once was, to 1 cent, meeting the same demand on second-class matter that is now being made with reference to first-class matter. It will be observed that if the losses upon these two classes of matter are to be recouped, and the Government is to be administered, so far as this department of it is concerned, without a deficit, then it is an impossibility to go to 1-cent letter postage without the loss of $58,000,000 of revenue to the Government of the United States. I take it that no man in his private business, where it was necessary for him to retain certain departments in order to carry on the whole business, some losing and some making a great profit, would consent to withdraw the profit from those branches of his business which were profitable and place them somewhere else, instead of using those profits to maintain the departments that were earning nothing, yet were essential to the conduct of the whole business. No man could do that without quickly becoming a bankrupt; and except for the immense resources of the Government of the United States to-day, that would be the result if you should attempt to go too suddenly to a lower rate of postage on first-class matter.

The truth about it is that this House had as well meet the issue now as hereafter. You have to retain 2-cent letter postage for the present. You have to raise the postage on second-class matter above the figure that it now is, and, in my judgment, you have to make a readjustment of the railway mail pay, so that the people of the United States will not be carrying second-class matter for one-third of what it costs them to carry it and will not be paying more for transportation than ought to be paid. This Government does not desire to make any large amount of money out of the Post Office Department, but that department ought to be and can be made self-sustaining. With the proper economies exercised there, with a proper head of that department, who knows the law and the necessities of its administration, it can be made a great paying department, and it can be made of the greater service to the people of the United States of any instrumentality of the Government.

I recollect the smile that passed over this body when upon this floor 14 years ago I suggested, in the discussion of this bill, which then carried $87,000,000, with a deficit of $17,000,000, that by an increase of proper facilities to the people of the United States, by the improvement of the service and by a wise administration of it, and an extension of the service, in 15 years the appropriation for the Post Office Department would reach $250,000,000 and a surplus be produced. Those years have about passed. This bill now carries $278,000,000, and there is a contention whether there is a deficit of a few hundred thousand dollars or a small surplus.

If by the proper attention to the affairs of this department, by cutting down a number of useless offices in the department, by a proper training of the force, proper chiefs in the department, and a wise head to control all things in it, by a readjustment of these rural routes and the conversion of the star route into the rural free delivery system, the forcing of proper compensation for the carrying of second-class matter, the forcing of the railroad companies and other transportation companies to receive proper and legitimate pay, and an extension of the service in the cities towns, and smaller villages, another 15 years—and I am not a prophet—will show this bill to carry over $600,000,000 of money, and it ought to produce a profit of over $60,000,000.

I did not intend to digress into this line of thought when I rose to speak. My only purpose was to call attention to some features of the bill, particularly in reference to some matters that the committee have thought wise to deal with in the way we have in this bill on the subject of the parcel post. That law, as you recollect, was only enacted in the last session, and went into effect on the 1st of January. If we are to credit the press and the unofficial information from the department, there has been an immense rush of business to the Government in the parcel post in the first zone of 50 miles.

There has not been, and will not be, and it was not intended, I take it, that there should be any very great amount of business developed in the other seven zones for the present until we have perfected the system now in its incipiency under the report that is to come before a great while from the committee constituted for that purpose, and from the Postmaster General, which show the experimental work of this division. It is an immense service, and a great deal of money must yet be employed in carrying it out. I will call the attention of the House to a few matters of importance covering the aggregate amount of which I spoke awhile ago, of some $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 added to this bill on that account. This bill has but few large changes in amount, and a little increase growing out of the natural increase of the business, and the increases resulting from this system. For instance, we have been forced to add 2,400 clerks and employees in the first, second, and third class post offices of the United States, and this increase is chargeable largely to this service. Printers, mechanics, and laborers, 150 clerks. For contract stations we have added $320,000 to that appropriation. Rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices, not altogether, but partly on account of this service, $500,000. Then there are several hundred thousand dollars in the miscellaneous items. Pay of letter carriers, largely on account of this service, $2,107,000. Substitutes, due to parcel post and the eight-hour law—and that eight-hour law was a very wise provision for the men and for the Government, but it costs the Government money to enforce it—$685,000 in this bill on that account.

For wagons, automobiles, and all vehicular service necessarily on account of the parcel post almost exclusively, $550,000. Inland transportation by steamer routes in Alaska, the increase being due mainly to parcel post, $258,300. Inland transportation by steamboat, estimated, of course, due to parcel post—and I call attention to the fact that this is not railway transportation—$40,574.

Mail messenger service due mainly to parcel post, $455,000. Railway wagon service, $407,000.

Mail bags, $47,500. Compensation to laborers, $3,300. Mail locks and keys, $3,000. Labor, mail lock shops, parcel post alone, $15,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman tell us how much of the total of this bill is caused by parcel post?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I can not tell exactly, because the department has never given us accurate information. The gentleman from Massachusetts will observe that the department is asking for $281,000,000 of money and the committee has given them about $279,000,000, and owing to some changes in the bill that would increase it a little over that, but it is safe to say that three-quarters of the increase is due to the parcel post.

Mr. GILLETT. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee mistaken, and has not the committee given more than the department estimated for?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it has given less by about three millions.

Mr. GILLETT. Three millions more than what the department estimated for?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; three millions less than the department asked for. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that while the appropriations are practically about $3,000,000 less than the department asked for, the committee did not feel justified in complying with the demands of the department on this matter, because it is largely a matter of speculation as to what additional cost would accrue to the Government on account of this particular service, and, as it always is for the coming fiscal year as to the matter of increase of the general business, it can only be an estimate, and the committee to be on the safe side of these questions always cut the estimates.

There is included in the estimates the sum of $750,000, which we are asked to make immediately available for the extension of the parcel-post service, in addition to the things referred to in the bill. The committee could not give that. I have just received a telegram less than an hour ago from the Postmaster General urging that the $750,000 be put in. It may be that it ought to be contained in the bill, but it is asked to be made immediately available. It is to supply a deficiency, and this House on a test vote a year ago held that this committee had not the jurisdiction; that the Committee on Appropriations had jurisdiction to supply deficiencies of that character. So we could not give now the $750,000 in this bill.

Mr. GILLETT. The figures I have are that the estimates were two hundred and eighty-one millions and something over, and the committee has appropriated $283,000,000, or about $2,000,000 more than the estimate.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; the appropriations are $278,489,781.

Mr. GILLETT. Is that on the second report?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the first report. That report is erroneous as to the amount. Increases were put on in the First and Second Assistants' office, put in since the report was first made, because an error was made in the printing of the bill by giving last year's items instead of the estimates, and it had to be revised and reprinted, and the increase would probably run the amount up to $280,000,000 of money.

Mr. GILLETT. I have it figured up at $283,000,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think that is correct; but whether it is correct or not, that is the amount called for by the estimates.

Mr. GILLETT. The estimates are two hundred and eighty-one millions and the committee has given two hundred and eighty-three millions, or two millions more than the estimates. Now, I want to understand——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We have not given any more than the original estimates.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course the gentleman knows more about his bill than I do, and my figures may be wrong.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will show the gentleman wherein he is wrong.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion which, I think, will explain the matter? The department in making the estimates estimates for so many clerks, and in the end also estimates for the total amount; that is, the amount that is carried in the bill. The Treasury Department, which the gentleman from Massachusetts follows, does not pay any attention to the total amount carried in the bill, but estimates the total appropriation by the number of clerks at certain salaries. If you take this year you must compare the same thing with last year. If you take the department's estimates as to the number of clerks, then the bill is less than the estimates.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. These clerks do not go in all at once.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but I am speaking of the way the gentleman from Massachusetts arrives at his figures. The gentleman from Massachusetts takes the number of clerks estimated for and compares that with the total amount estimated for, and those two will not jibe.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that on a revision of the matter, in view of the uncertainty of the situation, we attempted to give to the department all we possibly could consistently, reserving, in our own judgment, a small amount in view of the fact that the estimates were generally sufficiently large. There are places where we have cut the estimates. Upon the face of the matter, while the original figures showed $278,000,000, we made some increases, but not as much as the estimates.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question? This bill exceeds last year's bill by about $12,000,000?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; the amount last year was two hundred and seventy-one million and odd dollars.

Mr. GILLETT. The question I wanted to get at is: How much of that is due to the parcel post? Can the gentleman tell me that?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Last year?

Mr. GILLETT. No. How much of that excess of this year over last year is due to the parcel post?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The bill last year was for two hundred and seventy-one million and odd dollars, and this year it is $278,485,000. That makes a difference of $7,000,000 and something.

Mr. GILLETT. That is the first bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the first; and I take it that of those eight and a half million dollars there are about five and a half millions that are due to the parcel post. That would be the rough figures. I have here the various items chargeable to the parcel post in the opinion, of course, of the gentlemen having the matters in charge, and they have given their best judgment.

I will now proceed to state some of the items further under the fourth assistant's office that are chargeable to that service. There is an addition of $5,000 for stationery in money-order offices, $5,000 for registry, and $2,500 for blank books and printed matter. Letter balances and scales, which they had to buy for the parcels post, $100,000. Facing slips, $5,000. Purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriters, $5,000. Inland transportation by star routes due to the parcels post, $73,000.

I have not attempted to give to this House any elaborate explanation or discussion of this bill. I have prepared nothing upon that subject. In view of the fact that the last bill contains so much legislation, and this one so little that is new, I think the House will have no trouble in reaching the amount of money that ought to go to these departments. When the bill is taken up by items, if it is desired, if the committee is able to do so, we shall try to give Members some further explanations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I correctly caught the gentleman's remark in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], touching the increase of inspectors in view of the late order that brings the southern and western portions of the country, as to fourth-class postmasters, into the classified service. I understood the gentleman to say that no allowance was made from that standpoint, and that he apprehended, I take it upon this bill, to take those officials out of the classified service by legislation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I did not mean to convey the idea that there would be any attempt in this bill to take those gentlemen out of the classified service. I meant simply to say that the 390-odd men are now employed, and that they have not any more work than they ought to do, or, in my opinion, as much work as they ought to do; and that they can perform all the duties incumbent upon them without any increase in number on account of this proposed change; and I expressed simply the hope that matters might be so adjusted before a great while that it would not be necessary for inspectors to have anything to do with the appointment of fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman had in view, of course, the thought that the order of the President should be revoked.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I hope the President will revoke that civil-service order, and hope so with all my soul. I think it is wrong.

Mr. CANNON. Including the northern and eastern parts of the country?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. I would not have the northern and eastern part of the country treated any differently than the southern. I want to say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, this Government ought not to be put to one cent of expense of any character on account of fourth-class postmasters. If the postmaster is appointed and he is required to buy the equipment of his office and account for it at the end of the year and make a settlement with the auditor here, paying for that equipment, having given a bond and security to protect it, and he obtains the amount of money that is due him, there will be no expense in the world to the Government of the United States except the mere keeping of the accounts; while under the present system and under the proposed system hundreds of thousands of dollars will be wasted in a useless investigation of an office that needs no investigation. It is so plain and so simple and so easily managed that any business man could carry the whole on his books with no other cost than his entry with a perfect protection under bond.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit me, I would suggest that as to the order placing all territory north of Mason and Dixon's line and east of the Mississippi River, as to fourth-class postmasters, in the classified service, leaving the fourth-class postmasters south of that line and west of the Mississippi River out of the classified service, there are people who profess to believe that the order very seriously affected the political condition in 1908 and 1912. If I may be pardoned by the gentleman, I would say further that I am inclined to believe that the order as it was made under the last administration as to a part of the country has worked well, and I think it would have worked much better if it had covered all the country instead of a part of the country.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is always with great deference that I disagree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. I do not believe that that last Executive order covering, without examination, one-fourth of the post-offices of the fourth class into the civil service was just or right, not merely on account of the condition and circumstances under which it was made, but I believe it is intrinsically wrong in the application of the civil-service proposition to say that men in office, ignorant as most of them are in fourth-class offices, never having had an examination, shall remain in those offices until death or removal for cause, and that then the successor must be put to the rigid test of a civil-service examination. Really there is no examination needed for a fourth-class postmaster. Any man who knows how to measure calico and to weigh sugar and nails can keep a fourth-class post office, and there is no sense in these inspectors, as I have said, putting this country to expense by their operations of hundreds of thousands of dollars when the measure to which I have referred, if adopted, would save it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman in what he has just stated, and I further agree with him that the force of inspectors is quite large enough.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; I think it is. I think ultimately it will have to be cut down.

While on that question of civil service, I am aware that it is a very good thing where the service that an employee must perform is intricate in its character and where the specific or special information he must have is needed for the benefit of the Government. In such case it is well that some system prevail by which he be held in office in order that the most beneficial service may be rendered to the Government of the United States. But I do believe the time has come in this country when it must be democratic in the broad sense of the word, when it must be republican in the broad sense of the word, and whatever you may say about the issues and the controversies that arose from questions fundamental in their nature in the last contest, the American people have arisen to the knowledge of the fact that they have not and never have had a Republic in the United States. To-day the central Federal power under the Constitution is greater than any power exercised by any monarchy in all Europe. These conditions ought not to exist. This ought to be a government of law under the Constitution and not of men clothed with power to appoint men all over the 48 great States contrary to the will of the people. I know of no reason in good morals or in justice why a Republican President could place in post offices throughout the South, where the people are Democratic, men who are offensive to those people, and force the people to submit to the service. I know of no just reason why, if the voice of the people must rule in this Government, if local self-government amounts to anything, if the citizen is an integral factor in the Government, and has the voice of a sovereign, this Democratic administration coming into power should be clothed with the right to impose upon the people or a State that is Republican to the core Democratic officials who would be offensive to them.

The truth is that of all the hundreds of thousands of officers in the United States there is but one officer who is chosen by the people, and that is the Representative in Congress. Your President is chosen by electors. Your Senators are chosen by the legislatures, and the people have no voice in anything under any condition. This is in a sense monarchy pure and simple. We do violence to our intelligence in talking the senseless jargon that this is a great Republic in which the people rule. Why is it that under the law to-day your Constitution is the shield of despotism? Truly, the fathers did not intend that this Republic should remain for centuries like the initial Republic struggling with monarchy for existence, but they intended the development and progress of American institutions. Why can you not elect your marshal in the district in which he serves and have the votes certified to the President for his commission? Why can you not elect your district attorney in the same way? Why is it you can not select your collector of customs in the same way? Why is it you can not elect your postmasters within the territory of the patrons who are served by that office in the same way?

If you were to do this, you could claim some of the privileges of Government, some of the rights of citizens who vote at the ballot box, and some of the demands that we are ever insisting upon in local self-government might and would be recognized. Participation by the people in the selection of these officials would draw them closer to the Federal institution. There would be no longer any jealousy against the Federal Government. The people would feel toward it, when participating in its affairs, as they do in State affairs—that same loyal devotion and love, that same exalted patriotism, that men feel for the States in which they live and in which they first saw the light. We need in these United States the growth of a sentiment that draws the people to the flag of the Republic and unifies a Nation from one end to the other, and nothing but the right of the citizen to participate as a citizen at the ballot box in the affairs of his country will ever obtain it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, while I agree with much that the gentleman says so far as sentiment is concerned, the true and genuine reformer who wants the people to rule is for the short ballot, substantially as it exists in the State of New Jersey, where, if I understand it aright, the governor when elected has, perhaps more than a governor in any other State of the Union, the patronage by way of appointments. And the reason I interrupt the gentleman is to say that in my State the ballot at the last election was as long as these two desks in the country districts, to say nothing about the size of the ballot in Chicago and other large cities, and broader than the desk, containing the names of many candidates for many offices. Now, while I, too, believe in the rule of the people and the settlement of the policies of the Government at the ballot box, I will ask the gentleman if he goes the length of the true and genuine reformer that wants the people to rule and who declares for the short ballot? For instance, would he elect a President and let him appoint everybody substantially, except where the Constitution would prevent, and where, carried into the States, would spread over them substantially the condition which exists in New Jersey, which, I understand, involves the short ballot?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not favor the short ballot if that is the result of it, and I would favor a constitutional amendment that would do away with the short ballot if it brings that condition of things. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that in this country a genuine democracy, a genuine republican idea, is no longer prevailing in the minds of many of the people. They are not caring about these questions in some sections so much as they are about other questions that are destructive of the welfare of Government. I speak not of the majority but of the minority of the people of the United States. Whenever you begin that policy of Government under institutions like ours, where the State, separate from the Federal Government and sovereign and supreme within its powers under the Constitution, and where the Federal Government of limited power is supreme to the extent of the delegated power, and that fairly implied from it, more trouble can arise, more complex situations can come, than from a Government single in form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that he has occupied an hour.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then I will yield to myself more time, as I control it all. [Laughter.]

We find here and there throughout this country men who do not believe in law and order, men who advocate certain positions that seemingly are very popular, for the purpose of producing and bringing about a situation of chaos, where law and order may be overthrown.

I do not like to say it, because so many good people believe in it and think it is right, but the doctrine of the recall of judges is anarchy. That is all it is. There is no use to discuss that question. The doctrine of the initiative and referendum, while not anarchy, is not a good method of government, and if the people had the right to pass upon all these offices that I speak of immediately and recognize these officials as their immediate creatures for the control of their affairs, the people would not desire to initiate legislation, and they would not desire the referendum except when some great question arose that affected them as a whole, except when a controversy arose over something like your prohibition propositions in your States. They might want it then, but otherwise it would scarcely ever be demanded.

It may be said further, too, while discussing this question in connection with the post-office proposition, that we ought to have, and most of us do have, a profound respect for the administrators of the law. If law be discarded, the Government is lost, anarchy prevails, and disaster and ruin follow throughout the land. But while we may love the law and its enforcement, and while we may have the profoundest respect for its judges, one of the greatest dangers, in my opinion, to-day is over-reverence in some sections of the judicial official. I think that he ought to be with the law, but not above it; that he ought to be with the people and hold the law with the people, but never above the people. I see no reason why a judge of a circuit court of the United States and a judge of a district court of the United States might not be elected for a term of 10, 12, or 15 years and rendered ineligible afterwards, and make a better official, or as good a one at least, for all the people as the man who holds a tenure for life. I do not believe in any tenure for life in any office, unless that tenure is given to the official in successive elections by a majority of the people at the ballot box. We ought not to have any positions in this country of a life tenure. We ought not to have but few, if any, positions that the people do not pass upon.

May I say, here and now—and I would not have said anything on this question but for the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois—that I hope the day is not far distant when the American people will have more participation in their government than they have now, when they can go to the ballot box with the same pride for the Republic that they have for their States when they go to cast their ballots for their State officials, and that they may no longer feel that the Government of the United States is foreign and alien to them, but that it is their own, established to protect and defend their rights and liberties and their posterity forever. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. May I ask the gentleman a question in regard to the bill? I have been waiting for some time to secure some enlightenment in regard to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice in the estimates of the department that they estimate that the new parcel-post system will increase the cost of the routes in Alaska 100 per cent. They estimate that the parcel post will increase the cost of inland transportation by steamboats 5 per cent; that it will increase the mail messenger service 25 per cent; that it will increase the railway pay 5 per cent; that it will increase the cost of railway post-office car service 20 per cent; and that the committee has granted in the main those estimated increases—not to the full amount, but very largely.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman will recollect that I myself read all those items awhile ago.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not finish my question. When you came to the item of star routes, the increase in the estimate is only 1 per cent, and that in spite of the fact that the star-route service is the only service in connection with which the readjustment of pay was specifically provided for by the parcel-post bill. The increase there is only 1 per cent. Does the chairman think that increased appropriation of 1 per cent is going to be sufficient both to meet the demands for readjustments on the star routes and to provide for the increased cost on star routes in connection with the parcel post?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not quite catch the point of the question. I heard the statement of facts, but what is the question?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly, the committee has increased the appropriation for star routes 1 per cent.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is $73,000. Of course, it is about 1 per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. It is only 1 per cent of the cost?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. On account of the estimated increase due to the cost of the parcel post?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the chairman believe that an increase of 1 per cent is going to be sufficient to meet the demands for readjustments and to meet the increased cost of the service by reason of the parcel post?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman has observed, no doubt, that the star-route service is being covered into the rural-route service to a considerable extent, and he will observe also that while for inland transportation by star routes $73,000 additional is given, that is all that has been asked for by the department in this particular line. For the methods of handling the mails very large sums have been asked for here, and are used, and will be used for this service. You can not separate the service in any one particular item. The parcel post is a general service.

Mr. MONDELL. But there is no other item in the bill the appropriation for which can be used for the pay of star-route carriers. This is the only one.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The purpose of the department, I take it, in asking so little is that they want to reduce these star routes right along and cover them into the rural service.

Mr. MONDELL. That might be done, provided they established Rural Delivery Service, but in my State we have practically no rural routes. There is no such thing as changing on any considerable scale the star routes to rural routes, and we have a constantly increasing demand for rural star service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say this to the gentleman: I do not know, of course, just what was in the minds of the department officials in making this estimate. The committee in passing upon estimates usually does not give more than the department asks for. We yield to them the credit of asking for as much as they ought to have. The star route is a contract service, and we do not change by the law any of these contracts at all. While it may be true that a greater burden will be placed upon the men carrying the mail in the contract service than heretofore, on account of the parcel post, we have made no provision for it, and I do not think any is necessary to be made for it, for the reason that in all these contracts the right exists in the Government to alter, change, and amend them as the Government sees fit. The department, of course, can add to the compensation if it desires, or to the contracts if there is any great burden imposed upon them. I assume that the department thought this $73,000 would meet an emergency of that sort until next year.

Mr. MONDELL. During the hearings, in answer to a question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], an official of the department who appeared before the committee himself suggested that this was a very, very small increase, and it seems to me that it is a very small increase, if the Chairman will allow me, when we take into consideration first——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That was the estimate of the department, was it not?

Mr. MONDELL. When we take into consideration the fact that this is the cheapest of all the branches of the postal service, and, second, that the star-route carrier suffers in two ways. First, heretofore he has been carrying small parcels and has been paid for such carriage, and practically all of these contacts are let in expectation of some revenue from that source and in some cases a considerable revenue from that source. Otherwise the contracts could not be let so low. Second, the parcel post not only deprives him of that source of income, but places on him the burden of carrying an additional weight, without any increase in his contract pay.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Which the Government might adjust by changing the contracts, however.

Mr. MONDELL. There is authority to do that carried in the parcel-post bill, and what amazes me is that, while we give the postal-car service 25 per cent increase, while we give Alaska 80 per cent increase, while we give the mail messenger service 10 per cent increase, while we give the railroads 5 per cent increase, and the steamboats 5 per cent increase in the appropriations, it is proposed to give but 1 per cent increase to the men who suffer the most.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You mean the contractors on the star routes?

Mr. MONDELL. The contractors on the star routes lose both ways. They lose in the loss of revenue and they lose in the additional weight to be carried, requiring, in many instances, more live stock to carry the route.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But they are in a position that the others are not in. They occupy a contractual relation with the Government, by which changes can be made.

Mr. MONDELL. By which the Government treats them as it should not treat any of its employees. By reason of the fact that the Government contracts with these people, it sometimes grinds them down in a way that would shame the meanest sweat-shop operator in the world.

Mr. MADDEN. If the chairman will allow me, the fact of the matter, as far as I understand it from all that has taken place in the consideration of this question, is that the amount of star-route service to be performed during the coming year is to be very much curtailed and the amount of rural delivery service very much enlarged, and because of the enlargement of the one and the curtailment of the other the increase in the star-route service is to be a much smaller percentage of increase than in other lines of service that are not to be affected by the increase in the Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that if he has any facts and figures that show petitions for increases over the department's estimate for star-route service, we would be glad to hear from him when we come to that item in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment of his time to reply to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I promised to yield to others and I can not occupy the floor longer.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who evidently does not understand the situation.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman can do that when we reach this item in the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have promised the remainder of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. Is not the gentleman willing to answer a question about the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no more time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will yield time to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. All right; I shall be glad to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Ten minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I observe in the paragraph of the bill on page 19, in line 4, the total of the payments to the railway mail clerks is stated at $24,360,000. Now, when you come to add up the items in that paragraph they amount to a million and a half more than that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That may be.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman how that discrepancy is explained.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is due to the fact that the report when first made did not contain that which the committee desired, but it was made up from last year's report.

Mr. GILLETT. I am speaking of the present bill, not the first print.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know, but the gentleman will recall that this bill was introduced in this House on December 11 or 12 last, and that accompanying it was a report, and that that bill had about 50 errors in it because it was printed from last year's bill, and they had to be corrected; but the report has not yet been corrected.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman mean that in this bill the totals have not been corrected, but that the items have been?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Then, really, this bill appropriates several million dollars more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. As I stated to the gentleman a while ago, instead of appropriating $278,000,000, this bill appropriates perhaps $280,000,000.

Mr. GILLETT. So it runs several million dollars more?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; and about two-thirds of that increased amount is for the parcel post.

Mr. GILLETT. And that, of course, will be corrected when we come to the five-minute debate.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; it is all corrected in the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Not in the bill which I have.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Has the gentleman the last print of the bill?

Mr. GILLETT. Perhaps I have not. I thought I had.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is slightly in error, and the situation arises in this way, if I may be permitted to state it: It has been the custom of the Post Office Department for many years in making estimates, and of the committee in reporting the bill, and of Congress in passing the law, to provide a certain number of clerks at certain salaries, so many at $3,000, so many at $600, and others at amounts between those two extremes.

Because these clerks are appointed during the year and do not draw pay for the entire fiscal year it was the practice of the Post Office Department and the committee to make a lump-sum appropriation at the end, as is done in this bill, which is less than the total number of clerks in each class multiplied by the salary that is drawn; but there was added to that total sum a provision that the total amount to be expended by the department could not exceed the total sum appropriated in the figures.

After the law was passed providing for automatic promotions of post-office clerks it was manifest that in case the total sum which was put in at the end of the appropriation was not sufficient to make these automatic promotions they could not be made, although the law provided that they should be made if the limitation was made in the bill.

Thereupon, I have consistently made a point of order against that limitation and it has stayed out of the bill for several years. The appropriation for automatic promotion of clerks was carried in the bill last year, and the total for clerks was $3,780,000. When the appropriation bill reached the Treasury Department they marked up to the credit of the Post Office Department three million nine hundred and some odd thousand dollars. I apprehend that has not been expended, but it cuts no particular figure, and the same thing is carried in this bill.

May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee in reference to a few figures that he gave about the increase of service for parcel post. In the first place, in the current law there is a lump-sum appropriation of $750,000 which covers special equipment, maps, stamps, directories, and printed instructions as may be necessary, and to include the hiring of teams, drivers, and so forth. Are all of these things now practically covered by specific items in the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. They all come in under each head.

Mr. MANN. There are enough specific items to cover all these?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; that is what we think.

Mr. MANN. I did not suppose there was any provision in the bill which would directly provide for the employment of teams and drivers for the parcel post especially.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; it is under the section that provides for teams, vehicles, and drivers; we increased the amount so as to meet that additional service.

Mr. MANN. I understand the parcel post was inaugurated really after this bill was reported, and it may be that the department will derive additional information which it will be able to place before the Senate even after the bill passes the House, which would lead both bodies to agree to some additional appropriations if necessary.

Mr. LLOYD. If the gentleman will pardon me, it is the understanding that they are to make an investigation during the first 15 days of this month and make a report to the Senate, and of course the House will have the benefit of the same information before the bill comes in here for final consideration.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to state in figures he gave in reference to the contract stations that there was an increase of $320,000 in the bill. If the gentleman has the figures there, I would like to ask him if that is correct?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman will have to refer to the hearings.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman made a statement as to the probable amount, but that is not the amount carried in the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The hearings will show how that is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman read from some figures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. That 10 minutes so yielded has expired, and the gentleman from Tennessee has 15 minutes in his own right.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield a further 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my memorandum shows $320,000 as the amount of increase.

Mr. MANN. I did not know how much that had been considered in the committee. Three hundred and twenty thousand was the increase in the estimates?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; due in the main to parcel post. It is impossible for the committee or anybody to judge what is due to parcel post.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I will say that the department makes a rule as to the amount of compensation that will be allowed at a contract station, based on the amount of certain classes of business, and says that when a certain amount of business is done they will increase the compensation to such an extent. So far the appropriations have not been sufficient to do that; the rule has not been carried into effect, and every little while they have changed the rule. There has been a good deal of complaint about it. In my section of Chicago, where we have to depend largely on contract stations for postal service, men have resigned and refused to carry on the service because the department could not comply with the agreement that had been made.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that that item ought to be further increased?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure that that above $300 ought to be increased, but below that rate there are a large number usually starting out at $100, and if business develops under the rules the amount they are to receive is $200, and there ought to be sufficient appropriations to permit these increases to be made where a man will not keep the station without it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Kansas desire to use any time?

Mr. MURDOCK. There are no requests for further time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that the Chair may keep the time correctly, he will say that the gentleman from Kansas yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, who only used 2 minutes. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield back that time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am trying to keep all I can get, Mr. Chairman, and if the gentleman from Kansas does not object I will keep it.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I send an article to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ONLY THE FUTURE COUNTS.

On another page will be found an editorial which recently appeared in the St. Louis Republic. The Commoner has not commented upon the many editorials that have mentioned Mr. Bryan, favorably or unfavorably, in connection with a Cabinet position, but it begs to protest against an argument presented by the St. Louis Republic, which says:

"Woodrow Wilson's debt to Bryan is the biggest debt possible in American politics. Proper acknowledgment of that debt is expected. Popular belief is that it will be paid."

Another sentence reads:

"As to Mr. Bryan's fitness for the premiership or for the ranking ambassadorship, opinion may differ."

There are other sentences complimentary to Mr. Bryan, but these two passages bring out the point to which the Commoner wishes to call attention.

Cabinet positions ought not to be regarded as currency with which to pay debts. They are responsible positions, and in filling them the President elect should look to the future and not to the past. A public official has no right to discharge political obligations at the expense of the public. The men selected by Mr. Wilson for the Cabinet should be selected not because of personal service rendered to him, nor even because of past service rendered to the party. The individual counts for little; the cause counts for much. An individual, if he has had a proper motive for working, finds sufficient compensation in the triumph of ideas, principles, and policies; he does not need the consolations of office. Offices should be used to strengthen the party and to advance the things for which the party stands. It is pleasant to reward those who have been faithful, where that reward can be given without sacrificing public interests, but where past service is considered it is better to consider it as an assurance of future service than merely because it has been rendered.

The Commoner declines to discuss Cabinet possibilities, but it ventures to express the hope that Gov. Wilson will be governed by a higher motive than gratitude in the selection of his official household. A great responsibility rests upon him, and he will need the assistance of the best and bravest for his work. He ought to feel free to select for each place the man best fitted for it; in no other way can he hope to measure up to the expectations of the public. He need not—he should not—consider any service that Mr. Bryan has rendered to him or to the public. Mr. Bryan has been abundantly rewarded for all he has done, and does not feel that the party or any individual in the party owes him anything. If he ever holds any office, it ought to be given, whether by appointment or by election, with the view to the service that can be rendered in connection with the work yet to be done, not with the idea of rewarding him for anything that he has done. And the rule which is here laid down for Mr. Bryan is the rule which he believes should be laid down for all. In other words, the welfare of the party and the welfare of the country, not the ambitions of men or the interests of individuals, should be considered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had that article read as a basis for a few remarks that I desire to make. Whether we be Bryanites or anti-Bryanites, with the ideas and principles advocated in that article I think we must all agree. But we see a great deal stated in the newspapers about who is to be in the Cabinet, suggesting this man, that man, and the other man. I desire to say that the kind of men I want to be in the Cabinet are men who will tell the President the truth, though the heavens fall, without either exaggerating or minimizing it. I do not want anyone to go into the Cabinet for the purpose of influencing the President in favor of or against any individual. The President, as it were, must look through the Cabinet to see the conditions of the country. The Cabinet is in a way the eyes of the President. When I was a youth I read that under the English law they did not punish the king for any wrong done, but they punished his advisers. I thought at that time that it was a great outrage, but I have since concluded that it was a very wise provision of law. Those who get next to the king, those who get next to the President, who are intrusted with his confidence and who instead of telling him the plain truth as they see it color it so that he does not see the facts, but views them through colored glasses, and therefore does wrong through misinformation through the desire of individuals to either promote somebody's interest or to prevent the interest of somebody being promoted, I am in favor of hanging these advisors instead of punishing the President. This country believes and this country has confidence that Gov. Wilson has the judgment to do the right thing, if he can only have the facts presented to him without color, without prejudice, and without bias. It makes no difference to me who the man is who goes into the Cabinet so long as he be a man of ability, a man of full information as to the department to which he may be appointed. But above all he ought to forget himself, forget his friends, and, if he has enemies, forget them and tell the President the plain truth and let the President's judgment rest upon a clear understanding of the facts.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman complaining now of what he thinks the President elect is going to do?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman writing him a letter through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as to what he thinks he ought to do?

Mr. SIMS. I am not intending in this way to advise the President. I am trying to point out what I think would be an ideal member of the Cabinet.

Mr. MANN. Is not the gentleman telling what he will do when he is a member of the Cabinet? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have no thought, not the slightest, of ever being so honored.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman anybody in mind who will fill the bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I have nobody in mind. I am making no insinuations, but I will tell you what I do think, and that is the reason I am making these remarks. I think that within the last hundred years some Presidents of the United States have been misled and have been prejudiced unduly against some people, and have been used to reward others unjustly by reason of the false information given them. I think good Presidents in the last hundred years have done that which they would not have done if they had known the facts. When men secretly, privately, under the guise of friendship, mislead the King, the President, or anyone else, in order to secure some other end than the public welfare, they ought to hang instead of the King or the President. Therefore, I do not believe that such a position ought to be sought, or that it ought to be lobbied for, or that men ought to be appointed by reason of their extraordinary willingness to serve, but that they should be selected with reference to the general welfare with no other motive than that the public good is to be enhanced and not the ambition of some private citizen promoted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has 13 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I send up some newspaper clippings and ask that they may be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS PROTEST—PARCEL-POST PACKAGES NECESSITATE EXTRA DUTY, DECLARES THEIR LEADER.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 7.

President Carl C. Van Dyke, of the Railway Mail Clerks' Association, is en route to-day to Washington to take up with Congress committees grievances of the clerks over the parcel-post law.

Not since the threatened strike of railway mail clerks two years ago, declare postal clerks, has there been so much dissatisfaction among the employees as at present. It is charged the department has failed to provide sufficient help, equipment, or car space to handle the flood of parcels.

Before leaving, Van Dyke said: "Several chief clerks have prepared extra-duty schedules, so as to handle the parcels. This is unfair to the clerks, who are entitled to sufficient time off to keep up with their distribution."

PARCEL-POST PLAN MAY CAUSE STRIKE—MAIL CLERKS' HEAD SAYS GOVERNMENT IMPOSES ON 17,000 MEN—HE SCENTS TROUBLE.

Is the attitude of the United States Government, under the Taft administration and Frank Hitchcock, Postmaster General, relative to the parcel post likely to precipitate trouble with the railway mail clerks to the point of a strike?

Carl C. Van Dyke, president Tenth Division Railway Mail Association, says he scents some such trouble.

He declares he believes the Government, under Hitchcock's plans, is endeavoring to hamper the parcel post to the point of proving it a failure and that the influence of express companies is at work along similar lines.

The parcel post, it is admitted, will cause a great increase in post-office business. The volume, in fact, probably will be immensely increased and perhaps nearly doubled.

No provision, Mr. Van Dyke says, has been made for an increase in men, especially in the railway mail end.

ADJUSTMENT HOPED FOR.

It is confidently expected, however, Mr. Van Dyke says, that the incoming Wilson administration will take swift action and add a sufficient number of men. Otherwise, Mr. Van Dayke says, the mail clerks are likely to revolt.

"No provision has been made to care for the extra parcel-post mail on the road," said Mr. Van Dyke to-day. "The regular yearly increase, 1,000 men in the United States, demanded by increased volume of ordinary mail, is all that has been done. Practically all lines are still tied up from the Christmas mail.

"The situation with the parcel post is getting serious.

"The Government has an 8-hour law for employees. Clerks are supposed to work 8 hours. Even now they exceed that, but with the parcel post they will be forced to work from 10 to 16 hours a day.

"They receive no extra pay for this overtime.

NO ADDITIONAL CARS.

"No provision, in addition, has been made for added mail cars. A million mail clerks can not handle the parcel post and regular mail without increased room. It is impossible. An additional car must be placed on every trunk-line train, such as mail trains between Chicago and the Twin Cities.

"It is a positive essential necessity that local trains be given more mail space.

"For example, Chicago mail-order houses have announced that they will send a carload a day on each trunk line from Chicago of parcel-post matter. No provision has been made to handle this matter.

"Again, a woodenware company, in Watertown, Wis., has announced that it will send a drayload of pails by parcel post every few days. Judged by these two examples, it is easily seen that there must be, and quickly, provision made for handling the traffic.

"The Government may be experimenting, but it is doing so at the expense of 17,000 railway mail clerks, and it is easy to see the impossibilities of the present policy."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the purpose I had in mind in having the articles read was to get, if possible, the railway postal clerks in the country before the House and before the country in a proper light. It is true beyond doubt that the establishment of the parcel post will throw a tremendous amount of additional work upon the 17,000 railway postal clerks at present in the employ of the Government. I know of no higher class of men in the Government service than the railway postal clerks. Of the millions and millions of tons of mail that are handled yearly, practically the entire amount in some way or other goes through the hands of these 17,000 men. I do not know Mr. Van Dyke, the gentleman who put out the interview, but, if his interview expressed truly the feelings of the railway postal clerks, it might bring a serious condition upon the country. As soon as my attention was called to those articles I asked Mr. Schardt, the president of the Railway Postal Clerks' Association, what would be their position and as to whether or not there was any ground for the reported interview. Mr. Schardt answers me, under the date of January 10, 1913, to the effect that, while it is true that the parcel post will throw a tremendous amount of work on the railway postal clerks, and while they realize that to be true, yet they further realize it to be a fact that the parcel post up until this time and the close of the present fiscal year will to a large extent be experimental, and he informs me, as the president of his association, that the 17,000 railway postal clerks upon whose shoulders this increased burden will fall are perfectly willing to assume the additional burden and work hand in hand with the Government until it is finally determined how much additional work will be thrown upon them.

In other words, whatever additional burdens might be required by the parcel-post legislation, there is no danger of any railway postal clerks being disgruntled and sore.

Now I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the letter be read in the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RAILWAY MAIL ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1913.

Hon. W. E. COX,
Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives, United States.

DEAR MR. COX: Replying to your inquiry regarding certain sensational interviews given to the press recently by individuals claiming to speak for the employees of the Railway Mail Service, I beg to advise you that the sentiments expressed in the press dispatches referred to do not in any sense represent the attitude of the rank and file of our service.

The parcel-post service became operative January 1, and one of the dispatches advertising our men as being in revolt against the system was given out January 2. The men of the Railway Mail Service do not complain until they are hurt. They are broad-minded enough to recognize that in the early operations of our newly inaugurated parcel-post system it is inevitable that some complications should arise. Their loyalty and patriotism will prompt them to put forth their best efforts to help the Government make a success of this new feature of the postal service.

The men of the Railway Mail Service have every confidence that as the needs of this service manifest themselves the Government will make adequate provision, so that whatever complications or hardships may arise while the service is adjusting itself to the new conditions shall only be temporary.

The men of our service entertain no thought of revolt or strike, and it is to be regretted that the press dispatches should have advertised us in such an unwarranted light. Such talk is only a part of the pernicious agitation carried on by a few disappointed and disgruntled ex-employees of the service who thrive on the unrest and disloyalty they are able to incite.

Referring to your allusion to the offensive references and insinuating charges directed against the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads of both the House and Senate during the last session by a publication claiming to represent railway postal clerks, I beg to advise you that we do not indorse the course pursued by this publication. We recognize only too well that such attacks are not calculated to encourage a proper regard in the minds of the younger men of our service for the integrity of Congress. The men who are in the service and have the best interest of the service at heart are desirous of maintaining respectful and cooperative relations with the Congress and the department, and they have no sympathy with the efforts of these outsiders who engender disrespect and contempt for constituted authority and we do not wish to be judged, either by Congress or by the public, by the tactics of these irresponsible individuals.

The Railway Mail Association appreciates what Congress has accomplished for our service, and we know of no better way to show our appreciation than by cooperating with Congress and the Post Office Department in everything that will make for a better and greater service and a satisfied and loyal corps of employees.

Assuring you that the men of the Railway Mail Service will be found ready and willing to do their part to make the parcel post a success, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

P. J. SCHARDT,
President Railway Mail Association.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has but two minutes remaining.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] the time he desires to give to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] is recognized.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the investigation of the money question before the Banking and Currency Committee I insisted that what we required was remedial legislation and not investigation, as the public was thoroughly acquainted with the situation.

I have introduced a bill (H. R. 27139), which bill provides a remedy for the defects of our currency system without attempting to formulate a new and untried system, which may or may not be suited to our wants, and is of much more importance to the banking community than the investigation which is now being conducted by the House. Therefore I take this opportunity to address the House, and when it is reported out from the Committee on Banking and Currency and comes before the House I shall make a more complete statement.

CENTRAL BANK.

I do not believe in a central bank, though it may be called by a different name. The dominant political party has condemned it in its platform, and, I believe, that condemnation is wise and in accordance with true Democratic doctrine. To vest any one corporation with the exclusive right to issue paper money is to transfer sovereign power from the people and to constitute a monopoly, compared with which all so-called trusts and combinations in restraint of trade are but pigmies. We want no giant vested with a power which can destroy the very liberties of a self-governing people. We must preserve the separate units of our banking system free from the concentrated control of any one powerful organization.

DEFECTIVE SYSTEM.

I concede, as everybody does, that we have a defective banking system, but I feel sure these defects have come from unwise legislation originally begun as a war necessity, which can be pointed out and remedied, and I do not believe it is necessary to legislate in antagonism to the whole theory of our form of government in order to remedy these defects.

After giving much thought and study to the subject, I believe the cause of our monetary troubles may be succinctly stated thus:

The destruction of the bank function of note issue and the false assumption that debt represented by paper money is equivalent to coin.

I maintain that the present restricted issue of bank currency is not the exercise of the bank function of note issue (or circulation), and that so long as it exists we can have no elasticity in such circulation and no issue of bank debts in the form of currency responsive to the demands of trade.

All students of the subject, by different processes of reasoning, have reached the conclusion that a bond-secured bank currency can never be responsive to the demands of a commercial community. I think a satisfactory explanation of that fact is that such currency is really issued in payment of the Government debt it represents, and hence can not be issued in response to a commercial demand.

ALDRICH REMEDY.

We must therefore get rid of this bond-secured bank currency, and the question is, How? Mr. Aldrich's remedy is for one central bank to issue its notes and thereby take up all the present bank notes outstanding, receiving the bonds held as security, and increase the interest to be paid on such bonds 1 per cent, or about $7,000,000 per annum. He makes these notes a "legal reserve" for other banks, thus continuing the fiction that a debt is equivalent to coin—one of our great sources of trouble.

I can not see what benefit accrues to the public from having this bond-secured currency issued by one instead of many banks; the want of flexibility or elasticity remains the same to the extent that such issuance is used to pay for the Government debt represented by the bonds taken over. I can see a very distinct disadvantage in providing that these bank notes, which are used to pay for the bonds, may be counted as legal reserve of other banks; it is a species of inflation of the circulating medium, and continues a legal fiction which we all know is not true and which is contrary to all sound principles of good banking. It needs no argument to convince anyone who thinks on the subject—for the mere assertion is conclusive—that the proper reserve for bank indebtedness is gold coin, and that no amount of legislation can make any debt equivalent to coin, as a matter of fact.

The indebtedness represented by the notes of one central bank, or of all the banks, is carried by the public, which holds the notes; the Government debt or bonds is the security for this note indebtedness; the public is the creditor in either case.

H. R. 27139.

My proposition is to continue the public as the creditor for the indebtedness of the Government, and leave the banks free to exercise their proper function of note issue under normal conditions, subject only to such reasonable restrictions in the matter of reserves and supervision as the public interest demands.

INTERCHANGEABLE BONDS.

Sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill provide that the 2 per cent bonds of the Government outstanding be made interchangeable with currency certificates at the option of the holder, the debt to bear interest when in the form of bonds and not to bear interest when in the form of currency. These certificates will represent the bonds deposited and will not be a promise to pay coin on demand, and hence can not be counted as a bank's legal reserve. Being receivable for all debts and demands due the Government and reissuable, they will be accepted readily by the people in their daily interchange of commodities and service, and being redeemable only in the time obligations of the Government can never be a source of embarrassment in times of financial stress or panic. This being done and the provision adopted for the funding of greenbacks, as is also suggested, we shall have one form of Government currency in all of which the Government will be bailee only, being certificates of deposit for either gold, silver, or bonds. The advantages of this procedure may be summarized as follows:

ADVANTAGES.

First. It enables the holder of a Government 2 per cent bond to obtain the currency equivalent at any time he may desire at 2 per cent interest.

Second. It saves the Government the interest thereon so long as the currency is needed, instead of paying such interest to a national bank.

Third. It prevents excessively high rates of interest.

Fourth. It furnishes a convenient and elastic Government currency which will automatically adjust itself in volume to the business interests of the country.

Fifth. It follows the demands of trade, irrespective of the question whether or not the issuance or retirement of circulating notes is profitable to a bank.

Sixth. It has none of the objections existing to the issuance of so-called "greenbacks," not being a legal tender for private indebtedness, and is in no sense "fiat" money.

Seventh. It should be welcomed by all bankers, both State and national, for it enables them to hold a form of quick assets bearing interest convertible at once into actual cash.

Eighth. It can not produce inflation of the currency, for such currency is convertible into interest-bearing obligations whenever redundant.

Ninth. It can not produce exportation of gold under "Gresham's law," being the most desirable form of paper money circulating.

Tenth. It can not cause any increase in the circulating medium, for the reason that practically all United States 2 per cent bonds are now pledged as security for bank circulation, and the banks, in thus disposing of their bonds without loss, must cause a corresponding amount of their own notes to be canceled.

GREENBACKS.

Section 4 allows United States notes (greenbacks) to be converted into 2 per cent bonds, but as these bonds are interchangeable with currency certificates there will thereby be no reduction in the volume of the circulating medium. It will, however, enable the people, if they so elect, to remove from our financial escutcheon the only blot it has by abolishing the only "fiat" money we have; it will substitute coin in the reserves of our banks for the Government debt now allowed to be called reserve, so that reserve may mean what it should mean, namely, coin and coin only, and we may forget the term "legal reserve," invented to cover a fiction made necessary by the Civil War.

BANK CURRENCY.

Section 5 allows banks to issue circulating notes against assets to the extent of one-half of their capital by requiring 50 per cent of the issue to be maintained in gold coin as a legal reserve, of which one-half must be kept with the Treasury. This restores the bank function of circulation, or note issue, which is a necessity of every commercial community. The mechanism of commercial banks can not be properly maintained without this function, and the needs of the community demand it. Deposits in banks are debts which circulate as money through the medium of checks, and bank notes are only similar debts which circulate as money by delivery. The fixed restriction by law of the amount of bank indebtedness, which can be expressed in bank notes, has been the principal cause of our financial panics, and certainly the only cause of solvent bank suspensions, to which we alone of all civilized nations have been subject.

Uniformity of circulation at par everywhere is provided by having one place of redemption; knowledge of the volume outstanding is secured by Government supervision as now. Elasticity is obtained by the coin-reserve requirement, as the Treasury will become the clearing house for all bank circulation, each bank sending in for redemption the notes of other banks in order to maintain its own gold reserve. Thus we shall secure for the country a bank currency on a gold basis, circulating at par everywhere, which adjusts itself automatically to the demand of trade.

RESERVE CREDIT.

Section 6 amends the emergency act of May 30, 1908, so as to make it available in case of need by repealing the requirement for having 40 per cent of capital in bond-secured circulation, and also repeals the expiration clause of said act.

It is a well-known principle of banking that in times of financial distress and panic there must exist some source from which undoubted credit may issue. Until the Aldrich-Vreeland law we had no legal method whereby banks could combine and issue their joint negotiable evidence of indebtedness, which would control credit and allay panics. The various clearing houses of the country have, however, been compelled to issue clearing-house certificates not only for their own protection but for the general protection of the whole financial structure; these certificates being the joint and several obligations of all the clearing-house banks, have invariably served their purpose and been the means, though of doubtful legality, of allaying panicky conditions and preserving the credit system from a general collapse.

The law of May 30, 1908, utilized the knowledge of the benefits of this experience and authorized the formation of NATIONAL CURRENCY ASSOCIATIONS, which are practically a combination of separate banks authorized to do legally and promptly what they had heretofore done, only when compelled by necessity, irrespective of the law. Under the Aldrich-Vreeland law we have now existing 296 banks combined into 18 national-currency associations with an aggregate capital and surplus of $575,526,720. The general benefit to be derived from these organizations in time of need may be incalculable, and as a matter of precaution they should be preserved.

UNIFORM TAX.

Section 7 repeals the prohibitive tax on the circulation of NATIONAL CURRENCY ASSOCIATIONS and leaves the tax the same as on other national-bank circulation.

The theory on which this excessive tax was fixed was to prohibit any issuance of notes, except in case of the direst necessity, by depriving the banks of any profit thereon.

The theory of regulating the volume of the circulation by taxation is wrong; banks should be free to express their indebtedness either as a deposit or as a circulating note, in whichever form the customer requires. In the case of the national-currency association the issuance of notes will never be resorted to, except as a means of self-protection and public necessity; the inherent provision of their organization—that all the banks are liable for the indebtedness of any one bank—will, in practice, be a sufficient barrier to incurring such indebtedness in the form of a circulating note if no tax whatever be imposed.

TREASURY FUNDS.

Section 8 requires the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the banks any redundant funds of the Treasury in excess of $30,000,000; provides uniform security in all cases, but requires the rate of interest which shall be paid to be fixed by competitive bids.

It has always been considered one of the defects of our financial system that when revenues are largely in excess of expenditures the available circulating medium is contracted by the amount of such excess. Usually the defect is said to be inherent to a separate Treasury system, and the fact is used as an argument for its abolishment.

The truth is, that this defect comes from the destruction of the bank function of note issue, and hence the restricted amount of the currency or form in which the Treasury makes its collections. No financial system can be considered workable or desirable which does not allow Government revenues to be collected without disturbance.

The separate Treasury system, confirmed by 75 years' experience, is most desirable and efficient, and it can be readily adapted to our banking mechanism by simply fixing a limit beyond which its collections do not withdraw the circulating medium from the ordinary channels of trade.

The bill suggests $30,000,000 as this limit. I am informed $25,000,000 available cash or working balance will fully meet all the requirements of the Treasury.

FOREIGN TRADE.

Section 9 allows banks with $5,000,000 capital and surplus to establish foreign branches for the purpose of enlarging and facilitating trade with foreign countries.

The banking capital of the country is consolidated through corporate organizations, and these corporations are not allowed, under the law, to extend the usual facilities which are a necessary requisite of foreign commerce. The purpose of this section is to remedy this defect.

REAL ESTATE LOANS.

Section 10 allows national banks to loan 20 per cent of capital and surplus on real estate security, not because this is sound practice for commercial banks, but because the banks in agricultural communities find it necessary in their legitimate competition with State banks. In response to an inquiry made by the Comptroller of the Currency, 81 per cent of the banks favored this extension of corporate power.

RESERVE AGENTS.

Section 11 prohibits the iniquitous practice of allowing country banks from counting their debit balances against banks located in reserve cities as a part of their legal reserve. The provision of the national bank act allowing this practice was a corollary of the greenback idea that legislation can make a paper debt equivalent to coin. Under such provision the following may be mentioned as some of the absurd results and ill effects:

First. It allows a country bank to convert its own debt, in the form of a circulating note and the similar debt of another bank, into what the law calls a "legal reserve"—"equivalent to coin." The country bank has only to send its notes, or other bank notes, to a reserve city bank and then call the debt "Due from reserve agents."

Second. It diminishes the "legal reserve" required for the whole country by converting the debt of a reserve agent into what is called a "legal reserve." The reserve required under the law for the country bank is eliminated, and the city bank is required to hold a reserve only on its debt to the country bank.

Third. It accumulates in the reserve cities a great volume of undesirable indebtedness called "deposits" or "due to banks," which does not represent the bona fide debts of banks utilized by the industrial community to circulate as money through the medium of checks. Such debts are subject to interest charges and at the same time must be available to the country banks for the legitimate needs of trade. Hence arises the practice of call loans at the stock exchange, thereby forcing the use of this capital for speculative purposes, with the immense variations in rates of interest to which such loans are subject, and the unrest produced in the public mind, not only by such variations but by the rapid rise and fall in the price of securities caused thereby.

DEBT LIMIT.

Section 12 limits the liabilities of banks in proportion to their capital and surplus—that is, in proportion to the margin of security they offer for their indebtedness—and thus places a limit beyond which banks can not be used in overtrading and speculation. The present limit to expansion is fixed only by the amount of reserve required on deposits.

It would seem reasonable and desirable for the general good that bank debts, which are the instruments or substitutes for coin by which the daily interchange of commodities and service is made among the people, should be limited in proportion to the margin of security they furnish. This is the rule and practice in every commercial transaction, and the law in the case of many municipalities.

It is proposed that banks, which under the law are required to carry 15 per cent reserve, shall be limited in liabilities to five times their capital and surplus, and that banks which carry 25 per cent reserve be limited to ten times their capital and surplus, thus making in both cases 35 per cent margin of security when the maximum of liability is attained.

The tendency of this provision will be to induce banks to accumulate surplus earnings and to increase capital stock instead of indebtedness when business requirements demand additional capital, both of which are to the public benefit.

UNIFORMITY OF DEPOSITS.

Section 14 allows the Treasurer of the United States to transfer funds from place to place without charge, and requires banks to do likewise, so as to produce uniformity in bank deposits throughout the country.

We have the bank debt, in the form of currency, circulating at par everywhere, by having one place of redemption, and there is every reason to believe that the other form of debt, called deposit, may be made equally current.

It is hoped this provision may induce the banks to have one central clearing house for checks, and it would appear that this can be accomplished by extending the membership of the principal Clearing House Association to embrace as a member each of the clearing houses of the central reserve cities and of such other reserve cities as might desire membership. [Applause.]

A bill (H. R. 27139) to amend the national banking laws.

Be it enacted, etc., That any holder of any obligation of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum may present the same to the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer thereof and receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of noninterest-bearing certificates of deposit in denominations of $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100 each at the holder's option. Such certificates shall be receivable at their face value for all taxes, debts, and demands due the United States, except customs, and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 2. That the holder of any such certificate may, at his option, present the same to the Treasurer of the United States and receive in exchange therefor, when presented in multiples of $100, interest-bearing obligations of the Government to the face value of such certificates, bearing interest from the date of such exchange at the rate of 2 per centum per annum, and payable on the same terms and conditions as the original obligation represented by such certificates.

SEC. 3. That the exchange of interest-bearing obligations for certificates of deposit and the reexchange thereof shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may adopt in order to facilitate the free interchange thereof.

SEC. 4. That any United States note when presented in multiples of $100 may be converted at par into United States bonds bearing 2 per centum interest per annum, and payable at the option of the Government, and when so converted shall be canceled and destroyed.

SEC. 5. That any national banking association may upon application receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes to the full amount of its capital stock; such notes are to be secured either by United States bonds, as now required by law, or by a gold coin reserve of 50 per cent of the amount not secured by United States bonds; of such gold coin reserve at least one-half shall always be kept with the United States Treasury, to the credit of such banking association, available for the redemption of the circulating notes upon presentation. Certificate of deposit for gold coin, issued by the United States Treasury, shall be considered as equivalent to gold coin.

All circulating notes issued under the provisions hereof shall constitute a prior lien on all the assets of the issuing bank, and in case of liquidation, whether voluntary or involuntary, all such outstanding notes shall be redeemed and canceled, or a sufficient amount therefor deposited with the United States Treasurer before any division of assets among other creditors. In the event there should be insufficient assets to pay the outstanding circulating notes of the liquidating bank, any deficit shall be assessed and paid pro rata by all other banks having outstanding circulating notes under the provisions of this act at the time of such assessment.

SEC. 6. That the act of May 30, 1908, is hereby amended as follows: In section 1 and section 3 the words following the word "outstanding" are hereby repealed and erased, to wit, "secured by the deposit of bonds of the United States to an amount not less than 40 per centum of its capital stock." Section 20 of said act of May 30, 1908, limiting its duration is also hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. That all circulating notes issued under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, shall be subject to the same rate of taxation as provided by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes, prior to the passage of said act, for circulating notes issued against a deposit of United States bonds bearing 2 per centum interest.

SEC. 8. That whenever the available cash balance in the Treasury shall exceed the sum of $30,000,000 it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to require such excess to be distributed equitably and deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in such designated banks as may by him be selected. Such deposits shall bear interest as may be determined by competitive bids, and are to be payable on demand to the order of the Treasurer, or such person as he may designate, and are to be limited in amount as to any one bank to 50 per centum of its capital and surplus, but the Secretary shall require, before any deposit is made, adequate security to the full extent of such deposit. They may be secured by a deposit with the Treasurer of bonds which are a legal investment for postal savings banks, or by approved commercial bills or notes maturing within four months, indorsed by the depository bank, the face value of such notes to be at least double the amount secured thereby. Such deposits may also be secured by the guaranty or indorsement of the National Currency Association (organized under the act approved May 30, 1908), of which the depository bank is a member. In case of voluntary or involuntary liquidation such deposits shall constitute a prior lien on all the assets of the depository bank.

SEC. 9. That any national banking association having a paid-up capital and surplus amounting to $5,000,000 may establish one or more places of business in the capital or a seaport city of any foreign country for the purpose of facilitating exchanges, granting letters of credit, dealing in gold coin or bullion, and such other business as is authorized by its charter; but such association shall not issue or receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in any other unit of value than the dollar of the present standard, though it may be expressed upon the fact of such circulating note the equivalent in foreign gold coin at which it is redeemable on presentation. Such place of business shall be denominated a foreign department or branch, and shall be subject to the same visitorial and other powers as are now conferred by law on the Comptroller of the Currency for all national banking associations; any additional expense attending the periodical examination of such foreign department or branch or the issuance of its circulation shall be assessed and paid by the parent institution.

SEC. 10. That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to loan of its assets not exceeding 20 per centum of its capital and surplus upon real estate security.

SEC. 11. That all provisions of the national-bank act allowing balances due from other banks located in designated reserve cities to be counted as a part of a bank's "legal money reserve" are hereby repealed.

SEC. 12. That the total liabilities of any national banking association (exclusive of its capital stock and surplus) now required by law to keep 15 per centum lawful money reserve shall not exceed five times its capital and surplus, and the similar liabilities of any national banking association now required by law to keep 25 per centum lawful money reserve shall not exceed 10 times its capital and surplus, unless in each case such excess liabilities are fully covered by additional cash assets equal to such excess.

SEC. 13. That the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized to transfer funds without charge from any depository bank or subtreasury to another against a deposit with him of gold coin or currency, and hereafter it shall be unlawful for any national banking association to make any charge for exchange in making similar domestic transfers.

SEC. 14. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has one minute remaining.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] if he wishes to use any of his time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that there is no request for time on this side.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each; 10 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 15 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 26 inspectors, at $2,100 each; 15 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 29 inspectors, at $1,900 each; 65 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 65 inspectors, at $1,700 each; 75 inspectors, at $1,600 each; and 65 inspectors, at $1,500 each; in all, $704,450: Provided, That, for the purpose of inspecting and investigating rural-delivery routes and proposed rural-delivery routes, a number of inspectors, not exceeding 30, shall be placed subject to the orders of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General whenever and for such periods as in his judgment they may be needed for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this paragraph the items are all precisely the same as in the current law, with the exception that the number of inspectors at $1,700 each is reduced from 75 to 65. The total amount appropriated is not reduced at all.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the number should be 75.

Mr. MANN. I thought probably that was a clerical error.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making the number of those who receive salaries at $1,700 75 instead of 65.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the second word "sixty-five," and insert the word "seventy-five."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, that is the recommendation of the department, is it?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir; that is the recommendation of the department, and it is the same as the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem allowance of inspectors in the field while actually traveling on official business away from their homes, their official domiciles, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster General, not to exceed $3 per day, $261,400.

Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow inspectors per diem while temporarily located at any place on business away from their homes or their designated domiciles for a period not exceeding 20 consecutive days at any one place, and make rules and regulations governing the foregoing provisions relating to per diem: And provided further, That no per diem shall be paid to inspectors receiving annual salries of $2,000 or more, except the 26 inspectors receiving $2,100 each.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, at the end of line 5, by inserting:

"And provided further, That no part of the sums herein provided for the salaries of post-office inspectors or for per diem allowances to such inspectors shall be paid or allowed to them while they may be engaged in making selections and recommendations for the appointment of fourth-class postmasters."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order. I will not discuss that, because really it is a limitation as to the expenditure of the money. This question as to whether it was subject to a point of order was decided by the chairman who presided over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was under consideration, and I think the Chair is informed as well now of the parliamentary precedents as he would be if I should discuss it for any length of time. It is a limitation on the expenditure of the money provided for in this particular paragraph for these particular officers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], in charge of this bill, stated that in the matter of fourth-class post offices there was no reason why the Government should be involved in any expense whatever. I hold in my hand the order and the regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission and by the Postmaster General, and approved by the President, carrying out his order of October 15, 1912, in which he placed the fourth-class offices, which had not already been by the preceding administration put under the civil service. I had occasion on the 6th of December, when I offered a similar amendment to the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill, to call attention to this order and to offer the same amendment to that bill. I concede now that it was not exactly in place upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as I offered it, and the reason, I apprehend, that it was not received more favorably by the committee then considering the bill was that it was awkwardly expressed in relation to the subject matter then being considered by the committee. And I remember very well that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and those who opposed it, insisted that that was not the proper place in which to make such an amendment. Now we have the proper place for it. We have the Post Office appropriation bill here to provide for the salaries and the per diem, and the expenses of the post-office inspectors. Now, Mr. Chairman, at the time of this order there were some thirty-six thousand three hundred and odd offices covered into the civil service.

Of this number 31,799 would come under the provisions of the order and regulation which permits post-office inspectors to investigate, to make reports and recommendations with reference to the appointment of these fourth-class postmasters. So that we have here a provision for the pay of 395 post-office inspectors; upon this order devolves the duty of selecting fourth-class postmasters.

Last year when the appropriation bill for the Post Office was up I had occasion to call attention to the fact and to read from hearings before the committee as to why it was that those of us who are entitled to the consideration of our applications from our districts to establish and extend the rural free-delivery routes had been met with the statement from the Post Office Department that there had been this long delay in the establishment of rural routes because the inspectors were engaged on other work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 10 minutes more. Then I shall not ask any further time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I am proceeding in order when I discuss the merits of the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in order that there shall be no question about that, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and will let this be voted on upon its merits.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, we know that these inspectors were engaged on the business that had accumulated in the department, on frauds that had been perpetrated in the use of the mails, and we were told that that was one reason why this service of rural routes could not be extended, as contemplated by Congress. We were also met with the report that out of the money appropriated by Congress for this service there remained $1,200,000 unexpended. We were also met with the statement that there were applications that had received the favorable indorsement of the inspectors for two years remaining unacted upon.

Now, it is proposed by this order to place 36,000 post offices under the civil-service law, and to burden the inspectors of the Post Office Department with the duty of selecting or rather recommending for appointment 32,000 of these. Now, Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself—and I believe for the section of country from which I come—I do not appreciate that keen desire to look after the civil service and its proper observance that waits until these offices have been filled, without regard to the recommendations of the patrons of the offices, without any recommendations from the Representatives of the people in those districts, without even consultation, until those offices had been filled by the indorsement of those whom this Republican administration has seen fit to call its referees in those various States, and when those various postmasters from the first to the fourth class have, for four successive presidential campaigns, been called upon to aid in furnishing delegates favorable to the nomination of some one candidate for President. I say I do not relish that or appreciate that keen desire now on the part of the Executive to cover hurriedly into the civil service the men thus appointed to fourth-class post offices in the section from which I come.

Now, let us see what these inspectors will have to do in connection with appointments to offices having an annual compensation of less than $500, and there are some 32,000 of them embraced in this order. Those appointments will be made in the following manner:

When a vacancy has occurred or is about to occur in any such office, the Postmaster General shall direct a post-office inspector to visit the locality and make selection and recommendation for appointment from among the persons filing applications, such selection and recommendation to be based solely upon the suitability of the applicant and his ability to provide proper facilities for transacting the business of the office. The inspector shall make his report in duplicate and accompany each duplicate with a list of all applicants. Such report shall include a statement of the qualifications of each applicant and of the reasons for the selection and recommendation. The Post Office Department shall transmit to the Civil Service Commission one copy of such report, showing its action thereon.

Now, the duty is devolved upon these inspectors by this civil-service order—not by a statute, but by an order of the President and the Civil Service Commission, approved by the Postmaster General—and this increases the duties of these inspectors and puts an addtional duty upon them to go to the communities where there is a vacancy, to investigate and hear all the applicants, to take the testimony, and make a selection or report or recommendation to the Postmaster General. Now, I apprehend that some of us are going through the process of being told who is the best man to serve as postmaster in a particular office. I know I am.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Suppose this order should not be revoked or materially changed. Would the gentleman have these inspectors render the service without compensation?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I would not. But this is the only way I can legitimately put upon this bill my disapproval, and I apprehend that the Postmaster General, if Congress will not permit him to pay for this, will not require this service. If this bill becomes a law and carries this provision, I hope in the near future that this pretension, this sham reform in the civil service, will meet at the hands of the incoming President the fate it deserves—to be suspended or revoked altogether. So far as I am concerned, I have no hesitancy in saying that I hope he will revoke it. But for the reason that the proposition would be in violation of the rule, I would offer in this bill an amendment to revoke it by legislative action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to punish the inspector. I have no desire to say that the inspector shall not be paid what he deserves or for the work that he performs. But will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] tell me what authority the Civil Service Commission has to direct how the postmasters shall be appointed? What authority have they to require that the inspector shall investigate and make this report for appointment of postmasters?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, under the law at the present time the Postmaster General makes the appointments of fourth-class postmasters, and the President of the United States made this order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is true. But I apprehend the Postmaster General, if Congress adopts this provision, will not require the inspectors to perform a service for which they are not paid, and the Postmaster General will not allow them a per diem and will not force them to perform service for which they shall not be paid.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to say that this is the best way to enforce the Civil Service Commission's rules with reference to fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir. I am not taking any position about it at all. The only thing pending is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, and the purpose of the questions I have asked him is to draw out his opinion and to get his views on it. I am not taking any position on it as yet.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this was to acquire information as to the qualifications, and yet in reference to fourth-class postmasters their qualifications are to be ascertained by an examination conducted in accordance with the circular which I have in my hand, proceeding from the Civil Service Commission. But that only applies to about 4,000 officers embraced in this last order. When it comes down to the vast majority of these officers—32,000—no qualification is necessary except the indorsement of the post-office inspector. So that is another travesty upon the effort to improve the civil service. In 4,000 offices they must be efficient, as shown by an examination. In 32,000 they only have to satisfy the post-office inspectors.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not believe, does he, that the purpose of the civil-service law has been carried out in the selection of fourth-class postmasters or rural route carriers or any others?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think it has been carried out in my section in the selection of fourth-class postmasters, because they have all been selected regardless of anything except the indorsement of the three Republican referees of the State of Georgia, and the same in other Southern States likewise.

Mr. COX. The gentleman believes that politics has played a very important part?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not only a very important part, but the chief part. The sole requirement is the indorsement of the political referees.

Mr. COX. What has been the politics of the fourth-class postmasters who have been selected?

Mr. BARTLETT. Where they could get a Republican, they took him. Where they could get a man who was not a Democrat, they took him. When they could do nothing else, they took a Democrat; and sometimes they appointed a woman.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give any idea about what proportion of postmasters are Republicans and what proportion Democrats?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like a few minutes more. I have no information upon that subject, because when it became a fact that men not residing in my district, who had no interests there, were the authority who selected the postmasters in my district, whether they were wanted by the patrons or not, I had nothing further to do with it and did not feel that I was called upon to keep posted as to what number were of one political faith and what number were not. Fortunately, in my part of the country it was very rare that they could find a Republican.

Mr. GARNER. But wherever they could find a Republican they invariably appointed him, regardless of the sentiment of the community to be served?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and they appointed that man, whether he called himself a Democrat, a Populist, or nothing, and sometimes a lady, who had the indorsement of the political referees or of a member of the Republican committee in that district; and sometimes, as the facts will show, those appointments were sold, so much being paid for the recommendation, not to the three referees, but to the particular committeeman in the district who recommended him, whose recommendation was all powerful with the referees; so much so that this Congress passed a law making it a crime to pay money for recommendations to office, and that law was passed in this House at the instance of my colleague, Mr. HARDWICK, because of this abuse in the recommendations for the appointment of postmasters. Therefore, I say that it a late day to wake up to realize that the post offices need "civil-service reform."

Mr. CLINE. I should like to ask whether civil-service examinations for fourth-class postmasters extend also to assistant postmasters in first, second, and third class offices when vacancies occur?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so. I see from the testimony of the First Assistant Postmaster General that there are no assistants in the third-class post offices, except that provision is made in addition to the salary of the postmaster, who himself employs his assistants out of that salary. In the first and second class offices I understand that, they having been covered into the classified civil service in 1910 by order of the President, they now are to be appointed by promotion from those who are are on the civil-service list, and assistant postmasters are to remain covered in as they were by that order; or, if a vacancy occurs, they are to be appointed under the civil-service law by promotion from the employees in the post office. That I understand to be the testimony of Dr. Grandfield, First Assistant Postmaster General. That is as far as I can answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

I am not unmindful of the high duties imposed upon post-office inspectors. Neither am I unmindful of the great necessity of having such public servants; but within the last year I have found certain post-office inspectors making trips down into southern Illinois and making unfair investigations in at least two instances. I rise for the purpose of protesting against any man—public servant—being sent into any locality for the purpose of serving any other purpose than that of high moral and important duty to the United States. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that no post-office inspector has a right to go into any community as the servant of any class of men in that community or elsewhere for the purpose of making an unfair investigation so that the record of an incumbent postmaster may be blotted by a foul and unholy report made for that purpose. I insist that wherever such has been the case and wherever it is attempted public opinion and public interest ought to be respected and protests ought to be seat in by the people to the Post Office Department.

I have no disposition to criticize the Post Office Department of this country, but I do have a disposition to protest against any investigation in my district for the purpose of bringing about a partisan or an unfair investigation of the management of any post office in my district. My first duty is to my district, and my second duty is to the other districts of my country. And wherever an attempt is made to investigate a post office in my district for the purpose of gratifying the desire or whim of any set of men who seek to make a false record of local sentiment or to blacken the record of any incumbent postmaster, whether he be Republican or Democrat, Progressive or otherwise, as long as I represent that district I shall protest against it.

Mr. Chairman, I have discovered in one instance wherein one of these post-office inspectors fell into the hands of a certain class of men who sought no other end than that of defeating the will of the majority of the people in that town, and his recommendations, which were founded on the evidence of this class of people, were taken by the Post Office Department as the truth and as the will of the people of that town. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States in describing the power of the President provides that—

> He shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

It is quite within the power of Congress to provide that fourth-class postmasters shall be appointed by the Postmaster General, taking it wholly out of the hands of the President. President Taft has issued an order providing that these appointments shall be made through the Civil Service Commission and—in fact, to a large extent—through the post-office inspectors. It is within the power of Dr. Wilson, who will be President after the 4th of March, to revoke that order instantly, if he desires to do so, and to provide that fourth-class postmasters throughout the Union shall be appointed hereafter as they were appointed 10 years ago.

Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] offers an amendment, which my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] supports, that the inspectors shall not be paid for services which they render. Of course, if Congress provides that the inspectors shall not be paid, the President will provide an order under which somebody else under the Civil Service Commission will select these fourth-class postmasters. It would not change the selection under the civil-service order except the manner of selecting them, and certainly President Taft will not be overwhelmed by Congress providing that the post-office inspectors shall not be paid when they render services in selecting postmasters. All he has to do is to change the order and provide that they shall be selected, as most other employees in the classified service are selected, purely through the Civil Service Commission.

If that side of the House really desires to place itself on record in favor of the spoils system, the proper way to do it is to pass a law, which you have the power to do, providing that these officers shall be appointed by the Postmaster General, or else get Dr. Wilson to state that he will revoke the order, and when he is installed as President let him revoke the order.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the tenor of the gentleman's remarks, does he believe in selecting fourth-class postmasters by civil service?

Mr. MANN. I believe in selecting all administration officers of the Government, outside of the very heads, through the merit system. They are all in the civil service, and I do not know exactly what the gentleman means.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe it to be fair and in the best interests of the Post Office Department to cover into the civil service in the State of Texas all fourth-class postmasters who have been selected by one man, regardless of the views of the patrons to be served or the qualifications of the men who render the service?

Mr. MANN. These men are in the offices, and they can be removed if there are any charges against them for which they ought to be removed. They can be removed by the next administration as well as by the present administration. There are thousands of Democrats holding office in Washington now who were covered into the classified service by order of President Cleveland, issued as he was leaving his office. We are not complaining about that. What you complain of is an order issued by President Taft covering a portion of the fourth-class offices into the classified service because it happens to hit you now.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask if it is not true that every order that has ever been issued by a Republican or a Democratic President has covered into service men who were then holding positions?

Mr. MANN. Of course; that is always the case.

Mr. NORRIS. And always must be the case.

Mr. MANN. Yes; there is no other way to provide for the extension of the civil service except in that manner. But I wish the gentlemen, if they really believe that this change ought to be made, would make the proposition in such a way that it will be effective.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the inspection service there is one unfortunate thing, and that is, viewing it purely from the standpoint of the civil-service law, by some kind of means, I know not whether it is fair or unfair, there are at the present time about 334 Republican inspectors out of 395; and the unfortunate situation that presents itself practically is that a Democratic administration is coming into office and about 40,000 postmasters, who were selected because of their political inclinations, are, at the close of a Republican administration, covered into the service.

Now, if this law permitted an examination of some kind to be made before the individual secured his position, and if the post offices of the country were left open for examination under civil-service regulations after the 4th of March, I do not believe that the Democratic Party would be in a position to make the complaint that it now makes. We are not disposed, and the gentleman from Georgia, notwithstanding he offers this amendment and offers it in the best of faith, to interfere with the efficient service of this Government. But when you cover into the service at the close of the administration 40,000 employees, who secured their positions because of their political faith, and then say, in effect, that these men are to remain in their positions as long as they live or until charges shall have been preferred against them, it does not appeal to a party that will come into power after the 4th of March.

Mr. GARNER. Neither does it appeal to the sense of justice with reference to covering into the civil service men who have been elected regardless of their efficiency, and men that could not be elected to the positions that they are now serving in.

Mr. BARTLETT. And did not get the indorsement of their patrons.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, and I would like to know upon what evidence he bases his statement that there are more than 300 Republican inspectors?

Mr. LLOYD. By a kind of investigation that I think is somewhat correct.

Mr. MANN. I think there ought to be better evidence than that; my information is that the gentleman is entirely incorrect in that statement.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] give us his understanding of the political faith of the post-office inspectors of the United States?

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the proportion is, and I do not believe another soul on earth does.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not now.

Mr. GARNER. I understood the gentleman to say that was his information?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman must have some information on the subject?

Mr. MANN. I have information enough to say, from what I have been informed, that I believe there are more Democratic inspectors than stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] by a considerable number.

Mr. MURDOCK. There will be after March 4, 1913.

Mr. GARNER. About what percentage?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has the floor.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, if the test were a request of the inspectors to determine what was their political faith on the 4th of March, 1909, then I think no man who is advised at all would question my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but I think the test should be as to what their politics is as of the 4th of March, 1913. You will have them all Democrats then.

Mr. LLOYD. But if you want to raise the question with the inspector to-day, with the knowledge that on the 4th of March the administration will change, I think you would find that perhaps 50 per cent of them were Democrats on the 4th of March, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to treat lightly the post-office inspector. He is one of the most important factors in the postal regulations. He is one of the best men in that service. More is dependent upon him than on any other employee in the postal service. As a rule he is a man of honor, of integrity, of uprightness, and he wants to do the fair thing. There are exceptions. I do not wish to see him placed in a position where the charge of partisanship in the selection of postmasters throughout the country will be made against him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe anyone would be so unjust as to suggest that in trying to discuss this question I am moved by any partisan motive, because it has been quite a long time since I have had any opportunity to recommend for office anybody with any hope whatever of their getting the office. In fact, my recommendation was sufficient for the loss of all hope, and yet I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side that it seems to me they are taking a narrow view of this situation when they criticize President Taft for placing the fourth-class post offices under the merit system. If I had my way, I would put the whole Post Office Department under that system. I would put the Postmaster General under that system.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will in a few minutes. It can be done under the Constitution by the passage of proper legislation by Congress. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has referred to the large proportion of Republicans who are post-office inspectors. I have an idea, without definite knowledge of it, but from general conditions I think it would be apparent that under Republican administration the majority of them would be Republicans and under Democratic administration the reverse would be true, and they would be the same men holding the same offices, to a great extent.

The gentleman from Missouri has himself suggested an answer to his own question. That is natural. I will admit there are a great many evils, and there always will be. It is merely a question of reaching as near an ideal condition as possible. We can not expect the inspectors to be any different when the men who are above them are partisans. They necessarily want to please those who have power and jurisdiction over them, and it is quite natural, at least in the majority of cases, that men should shade their partisanship in accordance with the necessities of the occasion. We can remedy all of that if we will take out of politics the men above them. My experience, brief as it has been, with post-office inspectors has been very pleasant. Those with whom I have come in contact I have thought were trying to do their duty—almost all of them at least—without regard to politics and without regard to anything except the conscientious performance of duty. There are exceptions. Even those who want to do what is right might be led to stretch their conscience and do something in a partisan way that was not right if they knew it would please those above them who hold their office as a reward for partisan work in political campaigns.

The Post Office Department is the greatest department of our Government. You can compare it to a great corporation. It ought to be run on principles that are entirely foreign to partisanship. There is not any reason why the postmaster in Georgia or in Nebraska should change simply because there is a change in the occupant of the White House. There is not an official duty or any official in the Post Office Department, from the Postmaster General down to the man who cleans the spittoons in the post office, that is in any way partisan or that bears any relation to partisanship, and partisanship ought to be divorced from it in order that the entire people, regardless of politics, might be best served, and in order that all the work of that great department should be done in the highest order with the greatest efficiency and the greatest amount of good and the least amount of unnecessary expenditures of public funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who wanted to ask me a question, and I will ask that my time be extended for five minutes in order that I may do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. I was going to ask as a question of fairness and equity, as the situation now presents itself, with 40,000 postmasters selected because of their partisan faith, why they should now be covered into the service and the Democratic Party have no right to change their political complexion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I get the force of the gentleman's suggestion. The only criticism I have of President Taft's order is that he should have issued it three or four years earlier than he did; but in defense of it I would say that he has precedents for all of these orders. Grover Cleveland did the same thing, and so did other Presidents. Whenever they extended the merit system under the law they put under the system the officeholders who were then holding the positions. If President Taft has now placed anybody under that system who is incompetent, I presume it would be proper that charges should be preferred against him and he would be removed, as he ought to be.

If there is a way to put them under, to extend this merit system, without putting those of a political partisan belief in complete control, I would be glad to do it.

Mr. LLOYD. Under the Civil Service Commission, if these are to be covered into the service, could not the order be so changed as to provide for the examination and to allow all parties—Democrat, Republican, Progressive, Socialist, and Prohibition—to come in?

Mr. NORRIS. It applies to the appointments——

Mr. LLOYD. It applies to new appointments; but the fact is, the man is in, and he is going to stay in as long as he can.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will permit me, the examination does not apply to the new appointments except where the offices pay over $500, and there are 30,000 that do not pay over $500.

Mr. NORRIS. I had that particular question up with the Civil Service Commission—and I do not think anybody here will charge those gentlemen with being in any way partisan in the discharge of their office. I had up that particular proposition, and they were laboring then, at the request of the President, on the question of seeing whether it was a practical proposition to put these fourth-class post offices under the merit system. They told me at that time—and I think it will appeal to all of us—that in a great many fourth-class post offices the competition was not between men to get the office, but the question was to get somebody to take the office. We have many fourth-class offices in different districts in which we do not have men to take the post office—at least I do have many in my district—and in the question of post offices it is more often a question of getting somebody to take an office, and in such offices, when I recommended men for appointment, there never was a question of politics raised. It did not make any difference what the politics of a man was in those small offices; it was a question of getting a man to take it. But the Civil Service Commission in working out a practical scheme concluded it was useless to make extended examinations and make provisions for examinations to be made when there was no one who wanted the office, and they provided this plan of inspectors to make the investigation. I think they did it in good faith. I do not know how it has worked. If it is working all right, I think it ought to be continued. If it is not working right, I think the Civil Service Commission would be glad to change it. But there are a large number of fourth-class post offices where, if you were to advertise for applicants, you would not get a single applicant. If there is any better way of extending the merit system so as to include the fourth-class postmasters than is provided in this order, then let us have it. The President followed the precedents in doing it, but I am not wedded to it on this account, and I would be glad to support any plan to improve it; but it is a big improvement over past conditions, and I will not consent to tear it down until you can suggest something better to replace it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we are talking on this question of post-office inspectors on the assumption that it is a political office and that everything the post-office inspector does is a partisan act. No man can be appointed a post-office inspector who is not recruited from the ranks of the post-office service. No man in the ranks can get a place as post-office inspector until he has served a certain number of years and reached a certain grade, and even then he can get to be a post-office inspector only as the result of examinations, for which he is designated.

Mr. LLOYD. That is absolutely true, unless an order is made waiving the rule.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for just one word there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain what the process of designation is in the Post Office Department for the examination of those who desire to be inspectors?

Mr. MADDEN. So far as I am able to do so I will. I made a sort of an examination of the chief inspector one day before the Post Office Committee, and I made some inquiry as to how these men reached the place known as post-office inspectors, and I was told just what I have stated, that the man must have been in the service a certain number of years; that he must have reached a certain grade before he could be designated for an examination; that the designation is made, of course, by the chief inspector, and if the chief inspector is a rank partisan he can reject an applicant and designate anybody that he chooses, and to that extent, of course, the chief inspector has the power of life or death over the appointment of an inspector. I think that that is a fair statement of the case. But in the city from which I come——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not understand me as making any attack on inspectors? I have not done so here. I am attacking the system.

Mr. MADDEN. I am only trying to explain what I understand to be the situation.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not understand that I said anything in reference to the political office of inspector? I know some of them, and I know some of them who are pretty rank partisans, too.

Mr. MADDEN. What I was saying, Mr. Chairman, was this, that under the civil-service rules any citizen of the United States who is of good character and proper age, and who has the necessary qualifications, can take the examination which is prescribed, and enter the public service, and I undertake to say that in the neighborhood of where I live there are more Democrats who take the examination for entry to the public service than there are Republicans, and I have never yet seen any discrimination exercised by the appointing power of the local post office in Chicago.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman just a moment ago said something as to his entering the public service. It is rather a particular service.

Mr. MADDEN. The Post Office Department——

Mr. GARNER. That does not include postmasters?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. GARNER. That includes those who have gone into the service under the civil service?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. And it is from this class of men that I describe, who are eligible to appointment after examination, that inspectors are made. Now, whether the man who is at the head of the inspecting force already has power to appoint, may be so rank in his partisanship that he will not recognize merit rather than politics, I do not know.

But I assume that men do not rise to places of merit in a great business institution like the postal service unless they are qualified, and I do not know of anything in the nature of partisan politics that ever qualified a man for the performance of a business function.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to inquire of the gentleman how this eligible list from which these appointments are made is established.

Mr. MADDEN. It is established by reason of the fact that the man has served the requisite number of years and has reached a requisite standard of efficiency, and from that class of men designations are made, and from that class only.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. RUSSELL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate, sitting as a High Court of Impeachment, will on Monday, the 13th day of January, instant, at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., proceed to announce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 27148.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my friend from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] a question. He seems to be greatly exercised about the Executive order placing fourth-class postmasters under the protection of the civil service. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman is aware of the fact that the organization known as the National Civil Service Reform League has for years been advocating the classification of fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I am aware of that.

Mr. RODENBERG. Is the gentleman also aware of the fact that the President elect, Woodrow Wilson, has for years been a most active member of that National Civil Service Reform League, and that he has frequently participated in the deliberations of that league where they unanimously advocated the classification of postmasters?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; I did not know that.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question while he is up?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODENBERG. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman himself was at one time a member of the Civil Service Commission, was he not?

Mr. RODENBERG. Yes, sir; and that is the reason why I happen to know the attitude of the President elect, because he was one of the active members of the Civil Service Reform League.

Mr. LLOYD. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not know anything about the views of the incoming President.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think he has reformed? [Laughter.]

Mr. RODENBERG. I have no information about his reformation.

Mr. CLINE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] is recognized.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an observation about the extreme fairness that has been assumed by the gentlemen on the other side and in justification of the President as to the execution of the civil-service law. I am speaking as the result of my own observation, and my belief is that there is not a first, second, or third assistant postmaster in the range of my acquaintance that is not a Republican politician and who was appointed simply because he was a political factor, had rendered political service, and received his position as a reward for the service he had rendered.

Now, if the President had sought to present to the country an exhibition of fairness, why did he not invoke the same rule then, or see that it was enforced, that he now seeks to invoke, namely, that when a vacancy occurs in a first, second, or third assistant postmastership in these offices one of the staff in the post office should be promoted to that position, one who has gone through the examination and qualified himself. That would have been an exhibition, I take it, of real fairness on the part of the President.

I say it is not an exhibition of good faith in the execution of the law to induct into responsible official positions a lot of ward politicians, without examination, without any qualification except that they are Republicans, and then cover them with a civil-service blanket, under the pretense that you are executing the civil-service law for the good of the country.

I want to say to gentlemen on the other side that we on this side are just as strongly in favor of the execution of the civil-service law as you are. What we are opposed to is the system by which you have emasculated the law. That is what we are opposed to. In some manner, in some way, through some process in the execution of the civil-service law it has happened in places such, for instance, as those of rural carriers and fourth-class postmasters, that 90 or 95 per cent are Republicans. Take my own district, which has 168 rural carriers. Less than 20 of them are Democrats.

Mr. RODENBERG. How many of those carriers were appointed before the civil-service examination was required?

Mr. CLINE. I do not know. I can not answer that question.

Mr. RODENBERG. That is quite material.

Mr. CLINE. Less than 20 of the 168 are Democrats. But the method of appointing rural carriers which is actually in practice was adopted because, as every man in this Chamber knows, they are the most efficient political agency there is in the country.

Mr. RODENBERG. They were not very effective last November.

Mr. CLINE. That was not their fault. Every carrier who goes out to deliver mail on a rural route knows the politics of every man on his route, and I know that it has been made a part of his business to report to his superior the political condition of every man on his route where there is any question about his political loyalty. I am not arraigning the rural carriers. They are good men, but because of the environment of their appointment, the manner of their selection, they felt under obligations to the men who appointed them or to the party that appointed them. We are as much in favor of a pure civil service as you are, but we do not want to have a vicious system employed for the emasculation of the law. We want the law executed in good faith. That is our position upon that point. We say that in order to exhibit the fairness that it is now pretended the President has shown in his order he ought to have advanced the first, second, and third class assistant postmasters in the same manner in which he now seeks to have them appointed, by promotion from the places that have been filled by examination. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, as discussion upon this question seems to be the rule, I want to say a few words. In the first place, I desire to say that I am in favor of the civil-service law as it is written on the statute books, and I am further in favor of its being administered according to its spirit and intent. I have no quarrel with the law. I think it was originally designed for a splendid purpose. I think if it was justly and properly administered it would serve the country admirably. But I desire in a few words to call the attention of members of this committee to its fraudulent and vicious administration in the State of Indiana.

I want to add to what my colleague [Mr. CLINE] has said, and I base my statement upon an investigation which I have made in the State of Indiana relating to rural carriers, city carriers, and fourth-class postmasters in the State of Indiana. There are between 1,500 and 1,800 rural-route carriers in Indiana, and less than 5 per cent of them are Democrats. Less than 5 per cent of them were Democrats when they were appointed. I am not laying the blame for this at the doorstep of the Civil Service Commission. I do not know where to lay the blame. If I did, I would lay it there. But to me and to everyone in the State who has given a moment's thought to the subject, it is plain that there is some underground tunneling method somewhere; that there has been an undertunneling method somewhere, some place, somehow, to always indicate the name of the Republican who stood the examination.

Mr. MADDEN. Perhaps you will find it when you get into power.

Mr. COX. I am going to do my level best to do it.

Mr. MANN. That is something I have never been able to do.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does the gentleman from Indiana intend to use it when he finds it?

Mr. COX. I intend to use it if I ever get the chance. Some system has been in vogue by which somebody, either the Civil Service Commission or the head of a department who calls for a certain employee to be certified by the commission, is told that a certain man is of a certain political faith.

Mr. MADDEN. The Civil Service Commission are Democratic now, and have been for a good many years.

Mr. COX. They say they are.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, well, they are.

Mr. COX. I do not know anything about their politics, but if they are Democrats they or some one else has played a great game of politics for the Republican Party. I am talking about conditions, and I am talking about the manner in which I know the civil-service law has been administered in the State of Indiana.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean to segregate the rural carrier service when he makes his last statement? I am interested in what the gentleman says, and I am anxious to know if he intends his remarks to apply particularly to the rural carrier service.

Mr. COX. My remarks apply all along the line, as to the manner in which the civil-service law has been administered, including the Rural Free Delivery Service.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In all the gentleman's investigations has he not been able to locate the way in which the civil-service administration could be twisted politically?

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that I have not got to that point, but I am getting the information compiled now in the State of Indiana, and later on I proposed to introduce a resolution, and if I can have the House pass it, I propose to locate the responsible parties who have dug the underground tunnel whereby the law has been violated or not enforced at all in any sense of the word.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Indiana know how it is that the inspectors are frequently appointed?

Mr. COX. I know that the present inspector was appointed from civil life. He was not a post-office inspector at all. The President just suspended the civil-service law and dumped him into the office.

Mr. MADDEN. You can do that when you get your man in.

Mr. COX. The trouble is they have got all the jobs filled in Indiana, so far as the rural routes are concerned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to restate briefly what I stated a moment ago, at the risk of repetition. I am in favor of the civil-service law. I believe it was originally designed for a splendid purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for three minutes. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I believe that if the civil-service law was carried out it would serve the country and serve it admirably, but I state that some system has been found out in my State by which to get around it. For instance, an interview was sent out from the city of Washington the other day to one of the Indianapolis papers, and one of our State officers read it and wrote me a letter about it, in which he said:

> Your interview is absolutely correct. We have 23 rural-route carriers in my county. I know every one of them. They are to-day solidly Republican, and every one of them was a Republican at the time of his appointment.

I have reports in my office from a little more than 40 of the 92 counties in the State of Indiana, which reports disclose the fact that less than 5 per cent of the rural-route carriers in the State of Indiana are to-day members of the Democratic Party. I am not quarreling about that, but if we have a civil-service law I am in favor of letting merit win and not political pull, and the way it has been administered merit has had but little or nothing to do with it. I am in favor of President Wilson revoking President Taft's order putting these 36,000 post offices under the civil service and restore them to a competitive examination, where brains and brains alone will win. The very fact that the law has been administered in the way it has is what has bred contempt for the law. All over my State it is a known fact as to the way and manner of administration of this law. It has been so notoriously administered from a partisan viewpoint that many bright, active, intelligent, and well-educated Democrats of late have refused to go in and stand an examination, feeling that some roundabout way would be devised to evade the law. I have now in my possession a large amount of data backing what I say, and I have only begun to gather it.

I am in favor of restoring the fourth-class post offices to a point whereby an honest, fair, conscientious examination will be held, and let brains win, and not an underground-tunnel method control. If my party can not stand up and win with this test, so far as I am concerned, they have got to lose. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana how he is going to find this underground tunnel with reference to fourth-class postmasters. In the selection of clerks for the post offices they have to choose from the first three men at the head of the list.

Mr. COX. Yes; and in my judgment that is the nib to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is a perfectly plain way of discovering the underground tunnel, so far as the post-office clerks are concerned, but the local postmaster who is a Republican has no control in the selection of the rural carriers.

Mr. COX. The gentleman knows that before a rural route is established an inspector goes out and goes over the route, and then, as the gentleman from Missouri says, out of the three hundred and sixty-odd post-office inspectors more than 300 are Republicans. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, but right there is the other nib.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not believe that the gentleman will find any underground tunnel in the Rural Free Delivery Service.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RODDENBERY). The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think to some of us on this side of the House what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has just stated seems quite natural. I think we would be disposed to agree that both at present and always in the future, so long as the merit system shall prevail and appointments are made by competitive examination, not more than 5 per cent of the successful ones will naturally be Democrats. That possibly explains the condition in Indiana. Now, I know nothing about conditions there, but the one thing which I think is striking is that the opposition on that side of the House to the fourth-class postmasters being under the civil service has only sprung up since a Democratic President was elected.

Mr. COX. I think I can truthfully state that that was the only hope that was held out to the Democratic Party whereby we could ever hope to overtake you.

Mr. GILLETT. But when we were in power four or five years ago and we covered into the civil service in a portion of the country the fourth-class postmasters no objection then on that side of the House was made. You were perfectly willing that they should not be patronage appointments so long as we had the President. But as soon as you are going to have the President you want to have the old spoils system reinstated, so that you may have the appointments and enjoy the fruits of victory.

Now, the gentleman says he is in favor of the civil service in the abstract. I am happy to see that it is not as popular now as it was 10 or 15 years ago for a man to get up and say that he was in favor of the old system, and therefore men now readily say that they are in favor of civil service, but they couple it with some such a proposition as the gentleman says he wants, to repeal the order which now exists. They favor some modification which gives them an excuse to oppose the system.

Mr. COX. Restore it and make it a competitive examination.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; you always want something that is different. You want to go back to the old system and say you will get something better. We all know that the present system is not perfect, but I believe it is a great deal better than the old system. I will confess that when the fourth-class postmasters were put in the classified service by President Roosevelt I thought it was a mistake. I did not believe it would be a good way to select postmasters, but I think it has worked well. A great many extensions to the civil service I have at times criticized, but I have invariably found so far that in practical operation they have worked well. The only opposition apparently on that side of the House to it now is that it does not appoint enough Democrats to office. That is the real gist of the position which they are taking. That is the gist of this amendment which is pending, that the inspectors shall not be allowed. You want to take the fourth-class postmasters out of the civil service because you want the patronage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the order that has been issued as to the method of selecting the fourth-class postmasters different now from what it was when the fourth-class postmasters were originally put into the classified service?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know whether there is any difference or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that under the order for the selection of these men, if the office pays over $500, they are selected from the classified service after examination. But if it pays less than $500 they are selected by the post-office inspectors, and as about 99.9 of the post-office inspectors happen to be Republicans the gentleman would hardly expect Democrats to be satisfied to have Republican officials select, without the protection of the civil-service system, employees under a Democratic administration.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman does not think that the post-office inspectors, whatever their politics, are political agents.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are at times. Four years ago, when the gentleman who is now Speaker of the House was a candidate for membership in the House, and it was a notorious fact that if the Democrats succeeded in carrying the House he would be Speaker, the post-office inspectors went through his district campaigning against him, and they were so active that he was compelled to file charges against some of them in the Post Office Department. Those are the men who will be selecting fourth-class postmasters in offices where the compensation is less than $500 in a Democratic administration, if this order continues without change.

Mr. GILLETT. This order can be modified by the President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not a question of modification; it is a question of propriety in issuing it just before an adverse administration comes into power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for I did not mean to take up his time.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. The answer to that is that it is not necessary for us to repeal it; the whole matter is in the hands of the President. He can modify it in any way he sees fit. If there is danger of partisan unfairness in it, all he has to do is to modify it. There is no necessity for the House overturning the order and putting us back into the spoils system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to what he should or should not do may be a debatable question, but the gentleman can not believe if an error has been made or a wrong has been done, simply because the administration may remove the wrong, that the House ought to refuse to exercise any power it may have.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I do believe that if there is one part of the order which the gentleman thinks is partisan it is not necessary for us to repeal the whole order, for the Democratic President can be trusted to prevent Republican partisanship; and if you proceed to repeal the whole order on that criticism no one will believe that that is the real purpose. They will believe, as I do, that what you want is to go back and have the old patronage system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have no fourth-class post offices in my district, but if I had I should want Democrats filling those offices during a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. That is just what I thought was at the bottom of all this agitation on that side of the House.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the wisdom or unwisdom of putting the fourth-class postmasters in the classified service, but largely in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] I do desire to criticize the personnel of the fourth-class postmasters, certainly in my own State and, as I understand, generally in the South. If there is any local official who comes in close contact with the citizens of the community and who should be typical of the best there is in the community, possessing their confidence, it is a rural fourth-class postmaster. The fourth-class postmasters, in North Carolina at least, as they have been heretofore selected, are not of the class which is typical of the best element of the community. There are good Republicans in my State, but very few of them as a rule have sought or at least have been appointed to these offices. The rule there has been during the Republican administrations, when there was a vacancy, to certify that fact to the State referee who was ordinarily the State Republican chairman. He, in turn, referred it to the county chairman, and the county chairman selected the fourth-class postmaster to fill the vacancy, regardless of protest respecting his unfitness for the position. Protests were unheeded, and the selection of the county chairman was certified by the State referee, and the appointment was made.

The misfortune connected with this order is in covering these men into the civil service, to be removed only upon charges, and all of us know how difficult it is to make charges sufficient before the Civil Service Commission to remove the incumbent of any subordinate office. If any arrangement could be made by which the terms of all of these fourth-class postmasters, in my State, to illustrate, could be declared vacant and there could be a new deal by which every citizen could have an opportunity, even under the regulations now in force, to receive the appointment of fourth-class postmaster, I admit that much of the ground for criticism of this order would be removed, in my humble judgment. But because of the personnel of these fourth-class postmasters and of the manner of their appointment, and because they do not represent the best element in the community, I regard this order as particularly unfortunate and ill timed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All debate on this amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 28, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I understand that the figures "65," line 8, page 2, are in error, and that the number should be 75.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wyoming that an amendment to that effect has been agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "seventy-five" and inserting the word "ninety."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "seventy-five," as amended, and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order that it is increasing the amount provided by the general law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while that point of order would not be good, I think, I will reserve the point of order that the amendment having been adopted by the committee it is not now subject to further amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will reserve his point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires to talk, I have no objection, and I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like at this time to speak briefly to the merits of the amendment. I am not informed as to what the President-elect proposes to do with regard to the recent order placing fourth-class postmasters under the merit system. I am not in the councils of the leaders of the Democratic Party, and therefore I do not know what they are going to insist upon. But I think it is our duty to pass this bill and provide for the Government service under the conditions that now exist, and no one will claim that there are sufficient post-office inspectors in the service, provided the present civil-service order, or something akin to it, with reference to fourth-class postmasters is to stand.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would not agree to that. I think we could cut that down one-third, even if it stands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I live in a country where we have many fourth-class post offices. There are over 400 in my State. I have been recommending the appointment of fourth-class postmasters for 18 years, and I sometimes marvel, having had that experience for 18 years, that I am here to-day.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Some of us have been here that long and have not been able to recommend anybody, and we want to see what the experience will be like. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, out of the abundance of my experience, I want to suggest to my good friends on the other side, that I have so high regard for them that I could not think of uniting in a proposition that would give them the experience that I have had in all these years. They might not be as lucky as I have been.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would it not have been a little more consistent for the gentleman to have favored that change at the beginning of his experience instead of at the end of it?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, about the time of the beginning of that experience, to wit, after my defeat at the end of my first congressional term, I for a short time served the Government in the General Land Office. That office at that time was entirely filled with a large number of very excellent gentlemen, worthy and qualified. Most of them were in the main from the sunny South, all appointed by Grover Cleveland, and in the very closing days of his administration all of them were covered by his order into the civil service.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that in order for my friend to have a position for himself a Democrat appointed by Cleveland had to be demoted?

Mr. MONDELL. Not much. He was kept in a very honorable and well-paid position for a long time, and he was worthy of it, as my friend knows. But, Mr. Speaker, we must pass upon this bill under the conditions as they now exist. This is the situation: Vacancies are occurring in the fourth-class post offices. I am delighted to be relieved of the responsibility of saying who at various lonesome corners in seven or eight counties shall be the fortunate recipient of the honor and responsibility of handling the Government mail. I was generally able to very promptly make a recommendation formerly, owing to my wide acquaintance in the community. I think in the main my recommendations were reasonably fair, else I would not have been here. A great many of the men I have recommended have been Democrats, and I have never in any case of a fourth-class post office, where I was sure the party was qualified and was the choice of the people, inquired as to the politics of the candidate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have been somewhat interrupted, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. But under present conditions there can be no appointment at all until there has been an investigation and examination by a post-office inspector. It happens to be the case that the few inspectors that my friend from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has found in the service seem to be all in our locality, for the inspectors in my State, I think, are mostly Democrats. I do not quarrel with that. I think that is very appropriate for the incoming Democratic administration. But these gentlemen have great distances to travel, and I can not agree with the chairman of the committee that it is possible for them to perform these added duties and to make these recommendations within a reasonable time. It is utterly impossible. Either the system is to break down—and possibly our friends on the other side want it to break down and come into disrepute, by failure to make recommendations——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You have about eight inspectors.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. We have only two or three in our State.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am talking about the average of the State.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know anything about the average of the State. But I know that the force is entirely inadequate to care for these added responsibilities, and I have absolute confidence in the fairness and justice of the inspectors—Democrats and Republicans alike—to make fair and wise recommendations, so far as it is possible for them to do so with their knowledge of the situation. But we must provide a sufficient number of men to perform this service, else the system will be very unpopular by reason of the long delays in making recommendations. I have asked for an increase of 15 men of the lowest grade. It is not enough when you take into consideration the fact that there are thirty and odd thousand of these places. Vacancies constantly occur. The distances in the region where the fourth-class post offices are most numerous are very great. If the service is to be carried on in a satisfactory way we must have inspectors enough to make these inspections promptly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the service unsatisfactory now?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the old system?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the present system.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there are not enough inspectors now. The order was issued comparatively recently. There have been, possibly, very many vacancies since the order was issued, but I think there have been no appointments at all in our State, which is evidence that they have not had inspectors enough to make the inspections.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has noticed that the House has just passed an amendment providing that these inspectors can not receive any pay while making these examinations for fourth-class post offices, and I apprehend nobody can require them to work for nothing. What is the object of increasing them for the reason the gentleman gives?

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose the amendment was simply adopted for the time being for political effect. I do not assume it will go into the bill when the bill becomes a law, and there is not a gentleman on the floor who has any idea that it will. So I am offering my amendment without regard to that merely political amendment which was adopted here a few moments ago.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means the job-seeking amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Job-seeking amendment is not so polite a term, and I desire to be polite.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it not a fact that in the offices that pay only three or four hundred dollars it is often difficult to find people to take them?

Mr. MONDELL. It is very difficult in some cases to find anyone to take a fourth-class office.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman think that on account of the insufficiency of the number of inspectors that those who have these offices to fill will experience great delay? I have tried for two months to get an inspector to go to an office which a man wants to give up.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true. We are not able to have inspections made relative to applicants. Inspections are not being made so as to relieve the present incumbents. Therefore our friends on the other side in refusing to allow these additional inspectors are unquestionably keeping some good Democrats out of office, because if the Republicans now holding these positions could resign in these cases where they are attempting to resign, Democrats might likely be appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has made and reserved a point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it may be that the point of order I made is not well taken, because I understand the committee, while I was absent a few moments ago, increased the number. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that my point of order is not well taken may be true.

Mr. MANN. My point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois make his point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I reserve my point of order, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem allowance, inspectors in charge, and the chief post-office inspector, and expenses incurred by inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, unusual and extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred for maintenance by inspectors over and above per diem allowance while traveling on official business in the District of Alaska, and for the traveling expenses of two clerks performing stenographic and clerical assistance to post-office inspectors in the investigation of important fraud cases, $41,100.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman in charge of the bill that he offer an amendment to strike out, in line 16, the words "the District of," so that it would read "traveling on official business in Alaska." We have created Alaska into a Territory, and it is not necessary to describe it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 16, strike out the words "the District of," so that it will read "on official business in Alaska."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of rewards for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers, $7,500: Provided, That of the amount herein appropriated not to exceed $5,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, for the purpose of securing information concerning violations of the postal laws and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, in line 8, page 4, following the word "criminals," the following: "That section 17 of the act of March 3, 1879, chapter 180, first supplement, 245, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"Strike out the word 'books' and the comma following it in the first line of said section of said act.

"SEC. 2. That books and bound pamphlets not intended or used in whole or in part for advertising purposes, and not classed as magazines or periodicals, shall be entitled to the parcel-post rates as stated and specified in section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912, being an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make a point of order on that amendment. It is new law.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order until I can make a brief statement?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will reserve it for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is, I suppose, good, notwithstanding the fact that it seems to me it would be nothing more than right and proper that it should not be made as against this proposed amendment.

Gentlemen will remember that the parcel-post law was included as a part of the last Post Office appropriation bill, and it is for the purpose of curing an omission or a mistake in that law that this amendment is now offered.

I presume it will be a surprise to many gentlemen to know that books are not included in the reduced rates that are granted under the parcel-post law. I presume it will be a surprise to many to learn that codfish and beans can go through the post office now at a less rate than books can. It has only recently become understood that such is the case.

I think I may say that it was almost universally supposed that books would at least have the rates of such commodities as I have mentioned. The matter was called to my attention by some of the librarians of the country, who are surprised to find that books can not be sent to them or from one library to another, or that the great system of traveling libraries that is now in operation in almost all the States can not have the benefit of the parcel-post rates.

I can not understand why they should not have such rates, I am informed upon inquiry, in trying to ascertain the cause, that the proposition came before the committee for consideration in an effort to consolidate the third and fourth class rates, and that that would have resulted, perhaps, in including some matters under the parcel-post rates that are now having a better rate than they would then have secured. But certainly there can be no objection anywhere to books having the rates that merchandise has under the fourth-class rate; and that is the only object and purpose of this amendment.

I sincerely hope that the chairman of the committee and gentlemen interested will not make the point of order as against my proposed amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes a point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For compensation to postmasters, $30,250,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 2, after the figures "$30,250,000," insert the words: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in the payment to postmasters of the first class where any part of the amount of the salary has been computed on the sales of parcel-post stamps."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the postmasters of the country are paid on the basis of the amount of receipts at the offices. The first-class post offices are those offices which reach in annual receipts $45,000, and the salary of the postmaster increases thereafter up to a point where the receipts reach $600,000, whereupon the salary of the postmaster becomes $6,000, which, with the exception of the post offices at New York and Chicago, is the maximum salary of first-class postmasters.

Mr. LLOYD. This amendment applies only to first-class post offices?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; it applies only to first-class post offices.

In the case of second-class postmasters it is the same as with the first, save that the salary increases on smaller receipts. It is the same with third-class postmasters. In the case of fourth-class pastmasters, as most members of the committee know, the system is different. On the first $50 sale of stamps the fourth-class postmaster gets 100 per cent. On the first $100 sale of stamps he gets 60 per cent, and so on up to the time he sells $5,000 worth, when the salary becomes third class.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say that the gentleman's amendment appears to be a very good one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be possible under that amendment for a postmaster of the second class to receive as high a salary, or possibly a higher salary, than a postmaster of the first class?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think it would.

Mr. MANN. I should think, without knowing, that it certainly would.

Mr. MURDOCK. No, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. It might send some of the second-class postmasters into the first class, but it would not give the second-class postmasters more than the salary of a first-class postmaster, because if a second-class postmaster had sufficient receipts to pass him into the first class further increment by the sale of parcel-post stamps would cease.

Mr. MANN. The question, then, would be whether under the amendment a second-class office would pass into the first class by the sale of parcel-post stamps. Forty-five thousand dollars is the limit for a first-class office, is it not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the receipts from a post office were $44,500. That would be a second-class office. Another office that has receipts of $45,000 is a first-class office. I suppose the salaries are practically the same now. In a second-class office the sale of parcel-post stamps has some effect. It is perfectly apparent that these cases will arise. I do not say that it would be an injustice, but it is perfectly apparent that you can not keep such a thing on the statute books very long.

Mr. MURDOCK. My purpose in offering the amendment, as the gentleman knows, is because it is estimated that we will sell something like $50,000,000 worth of parcel-post stamps the first year.

Mr. MANN. I do not know who made the estimate, but I think it is a wild, extravagant estimate. I hope the amount will not be that large.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is an estimate made by the men in the Post Office Department, and I do not think it is very far afield. Our sale of stamps for first-class postage is now, I think, above $150,000,000, and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that this should be done for this reason——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's amendment goes in, it practically forecloses the proposition of allowing the ordinary stamps to be used on parcels, which, it seems to me, ought to be allowed.

Mr. MADDEN. They will not allow you to use them now.

Mr. MANN. No; I know the law forbids that now, as it did when they first commenced the special delivery of letters. There are thousands of packages which have been deposited in post offices throughout the country which have been stamped with ordinary stamps without knowledge that the law required special parcel-post stamps. And probably that will always continue.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that while I understand that point is well taken, here we have an old law—29 years old now—under which we pay postmasters; and I think the gentleman appreciates that that is an antiquated law which is out of date so far as first-class postmasters are concerned, if not second and third class postmasters. For instance, a man in a large office, whose receipts are something like $200,000 or $300,000 a year, has nothing to do personally with the sale of stamps, and the fact that the sale of stamps increases $50,000 or $60,000 a year does not add anything to his burden, and but little to his responsibility, and this is a chance to start in now and prevent a large increase of expenditure in the way of salaries under this antiquated law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should not such a limitation be placed on second-class postmasters?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have simply tried it on the first-class offices in the way of a beginning. I would be glad to accept an amendment extending it to other postmasters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. My idea was that if my amendment included second and third class postmasters it would arouse opposition which might be fatal to it, because of the fact that in some of the second and third class post offices the parcel-post business undoubtedly does add to the burdens and responsibilities of the postmaster.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman if the receipts from the sale of parcel-post stamps will increase the receipts of second-class offices so as to make them first class, would not their elimination have the effect of throwing the offices in and out?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not. I think it will throw the second-class postmaster into the first class, and make the office a first-class post office.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditors, and superintendents of mails, 7, at not exceeding $3,000 each.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think there is an error in printing the figures, either in this paragraph or the next one. There are under the current law 7 of these officials at $3,000 each. The department recommended 17. This paragraph does not increase the number. In the next paragraph there are now 15, and the department estimated for 10. The committee took the department's estimate of the decrease from 15 to 10 without making any increase in the former class. I am quite sure it was not the intention to reduce the number.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have just looked into that matter. These are the figures of the Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN. Then the Assistant Postmaster General has made a mistake.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. In what respect?

Mr. MANN. There are now 7 of these officials at $3,000 and 15 at $2,700. The department asked for an increase of from 7 to 17 in the $3,000 class and a reduction from 15 to 10 in the $2,700 class. That was a total increase of 5. Instead of giving the increase, the number has been reduced 5. I think inadvertently. You have given the decrease of 5, but no increase. I think it is not the intention to decrease the number.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It evidently is an error.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether you wish it in this paragraph or the next, but if you want the total number to remain the same as it is now, you ought either to increase the number of these officials in this paragraph from 7 to 12, or if you want it in the next paragraph you ought to increase the number there from 10 to 15.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It ought to be in the lower grade.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought to be 15 instead of 10.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let that correction be made.

Mr. MANN. After the next paragraph is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of mails, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, 10, at not exceeding $2,700 each.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "ten," in line 7, and insert the word "fifteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 6, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "fifteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate above $300 each and not to exceed $1,000 each, $430,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The estimate of the department for this item and the succeeding item was combined at $1,250,000. That was an increase of $320,000 over the current appropriation. You have segregated the two items as is now carried in that law and made an increase in the two of $200,000—$100,000 for each item. In every other place practically you have taken the department's estimate on the increase of work that was expected through the parcel post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Not in all of them; we have reduced some.

Mr. MANN. To a large extent, in the main, you have, as to post offices themselves and the operation of the post offices, but as to the clerks and carriers I think you took it practically as they gave it. Now, in the cities, in districts like mine, and I think it is true of other large cities, we depend on what you call the contract station. There are places in my district, thickly populated, where you can not buy a postage stamp within the radius of a mile, which is neither to the convenience of the people nor the interest of the postal service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Illinois think the increase of $200,000 is not sufficient.

Mr. MANN. I think it is not quite sufficient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why?

Mr. MANN. Because it will not cover the additional contract stations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. As the gentleman knows, this is a good deal of guesswork.

Mr. MANN. Of course, there is more or less guesswork about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest. At present, under the parcel-post system, do they permit them to use the contract station? Must they not go to the main office?

Mr. GARNER. I know from observation that they do handle parcel-post matter at the contract stations.

Mr. MANN. Of course; it is perfectly apparent to anyone that it must be done that way in the large cities. You can not expect to send the people a number of miles in a city in order to deposit mail to go by parcel post. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee would increase this item $20,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Last year there was an unexpected balance of $77,000. Now with the increase that we have allowed that would give $277,000. I do not want to do anything that will cripple the service in Chicago or in New York, but we are all more or less guessing at it.

Mr. MANN. I know it is more or less an experiment, but these stations can not receive any pay unless they do a certain amount of money order or registry business. They are paid on the basis of the money order and registry business, and no station can receive over $100 unless it does a large amount of money order and registry business. No station does a large amount of that business unless it does a large amount of postal business in addition.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand, what the gentleman from Illinois criticizes——

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing anything.

Mr. GARNER. What the gentleman is complaining about—it may not be in the order of a complaint, but he says that they have to go a mile in his district to buy a postage stamp. That is the fault of the Post Office Department in not establishing stations at more convenient places in the city of Chicago, and not a valid criticism of Congress for not making the appropriation when we have $77,000 left over from last year.

Mr. MANN. Well, I always accept the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I got my figures from the department.

Mr. MANN. I know that they have informed me that in many cases where stations were asked for in certain localities that they did not have the money with which they could establish a station. I have had the information recently.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the statement that he gets his figures from the Post Office Department itself, and so if the Post Office Department has made the statement which the gentleman from Illinois says it has, there is an error on the part of some official in giving incorrect information, either to the chairman of the committee or the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I do not think so. In the expenditures of last year there is an unexpended balance of over $77,000.

Mr. MANN. The committee gave $100,000 under the estimate of the department in this particular place, which is very material.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We gave $43,000 under the estimate of the department.

Mr. LLOYD. We are increasing this appropriation nearly 25 per cent, and that is a much larger increase than we have ever given before. There never has been an increase to compare with this. This appropriation from time to time has been running for five or six years with a very slight increase. Now we make an increase of 25 per cent, and we thought we were doing remarkably well.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What figures does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. MANN. What I want is an increase in the next item where they use the contract stations.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much does the gentleman want there?

Mr. MANN. Fifty thousand dollars. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate not to exceed $300 each, $700,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 5, page 12, the figures "700,000" and insert "750,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 5, strike out the figures "700,000" and insert "750,000."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that will give the service that he wants?

Mr. MANN. I hope and pray that it will.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we will agree to that.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the $700,000 is an increase over the current amount of something like 25 per cent; that is, above the appropriation carried for this item last year.

Mr. MANN. It was an increase, not of 25 per cent, but from $600,000 to $700,000.

Mr. FOWLER. As I understand, there is an unexpended balance.

Mr. MANN. I do not know which item had the unexpended balance.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There was an unexpended balance of the two items, one of $40,000 and one of $37,000. Of course you could not get the benefit of that under the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to get it.

Mr. MANN. We need the money for actual postal service.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that is true; but if the business could have been transacted by, say, $40,000 less than the amount appropriated in the last bill, and now there is an increase of $100,000, that is equal to $140,000 above what was used during the last fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. FOWLER], will pardon me, the increase that is carried in the bill will not increase the number of stations at all, although it would apparently give 100 new stations or more, because with the parcel-post proposition, under the regulations of the department, there will be a large number of increases from 100 to 200 and from 200 to 300, which would fully absorb the increase carried by the bill, without making any provision at all for new stations, and the gentleman understands that in the cities as they grow there is a necessity for new stations in localities. They will not establish with us a station anywhere that is within half a mile of another station.

Mr. MADDEN. And I may say that we have built in Chicago 60 miles of street frontage of buildings last year, and that means a very large increase in the population, and of course it requires increased facilities.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand how it is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] are complaining for the want of money when the report here shows in these identical items the Post Office Department turns back into the Treasury a large sum of money.

Mr. MADDEN. But there was no parcel post last year.

Mr. GARNER. But that does not make any difference. The gentleman is calling attention to conditions in Chicago, want of facilities there to handle the business in these contract stations. The Post Office Department has the money to do this work and if it has not been done, it is the fault of the Post Office Department and not the fault of Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think that may be answered very well in connection with something with which he has had experience. We have from time to time made appropriations for extension of the rural service, but in order to show economy in the administration of postal affairs, they have not expended the money appropriated from time to time, and it went back into the Treasury, and the consequence is that the gentleman and his constituents do not get the service that they ought to have, and that Congress intended they should have.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] says, but this state of affairs exists here. The committee is proposing to agree to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the reason that they want additional service in Chicago. It is merely a guess. If the committee had sufficient money, why does the gentleman want to encumber this bill with an additional appropriation, to be charged up to this House in the total amount appropriated, when you are not going to use the money?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that there was an unexpended balance on one item of $40,000 and of $37,000 on another. The department estimates that it will need $320,000 on account of this additional service. They can not tell accurately what it will be, but that is the best judgment, and from my experience I think that $320,000 will be needed. The committee gave $200,000, in view of the fact that there was an unexpended balance of $77,000 from the previous year. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for $50,000, and I think it is reasonable that he should have that amount because still the allowance by the House will be $70,000 less than the Post Office Department recommends.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield further?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand how a great committee of this House, having the largest bill brought into the House, can come in here and then permit a Member of the House who is not a member of the committee, who has not made any investigation about the matter, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], upon a mere statement from him to obtain an increase in the appropriation of $50,000. Evidently one of two things is true—the committee has not investigated as much as it ought to have investigated, or it ought to be able to say that the gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to this amount.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No, Mr. Chairman, it ought not to be able to say any such thing. The fact is this: It is purely an estimate on the part of the department to begin with, and it is purely an estimate on the part of the committee. The committee reduced the estimate of the department in accordance with the policy of cutting down and reducing as best we could, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] comes in here and states the conditions in the city of Chicago and asks that we give $50,000 more, which is $70,000 less than the department thinks we ought to give.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We have to pay some consideration to Members in this House who are not members of the committee. There may be committees in the House that arrogate to themselves that superiority that will brook nothing that comes from the gentlemen in the House who are not upon the committee, but the Post Office Committee does not claim all the wisdom of this House. It can be in error. It can make mistakes like others, and the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] ought to be enough for an intelligent man to get $50,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has the floor.

Mr. GARNER. Very well, I shall not take up further time now, but will wait until I can get the floor in my own right.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to be captious about any of these matters. I am aware of the necessity for an appropriation to carry out the great business of the Post Office Department, but we gave consideration to this item in the committee, as we did to other items, and, in my opinion, it is as fully adequate to carry out the business for which it is intended as any other item in this bill, and I can see no reason whatever for an increase of $50,000 to this one small item. I know that there are additional stations required in great populous, growing cities of this country, and we ought to prepare for them as liberally as we do in the country for the rural route delivery and any other part of the machinery of the great Post Office Department; but in view of the liberal increase that was made in these two items, giving something like $240,000——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FOWLER. And taking into consideration the amount of the unexpended balance——

Mr. GARNER. Two hundred and seventy-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. FOWLER. It makes something like $275,000.

And I do say, Mr. Chairman, in the light of all the wisdom of the committee, notwithstanding the honorable chairman's profession of not knowing very much about it, yet he is as familiar with the ins and outs of this department as any other chairman that I have had the honor to serve with. And, Mr. Chairman, I say, in the light of the wisdom of the committee and the liberality which was given in the increased appropriation in these two items, I do not think the amendment is warranted, and I will vote against it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to support the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I have thought in the consideration of this item in the committee room that the committee was not sufficiently liberal in its recommendations. We are establishing a parcel post that is going to add materially to the work of all these contract stations. In the city of Chicago alone in 1912 there were $100,000,000 spent in the construction of new buildings. Sixty miles of street frontage of new buildings was erected during 1912, making provisions for more than 150,000 increased population.

The work performed by these contract stations during 1912 was not adequate to meet the needs of that great city. The territory from which my colleague [Mr. MANN] comes has increased so rapidly that it is hard work for the Post Office Department to keep pace with the increased growth of that community. And, as he says, stations are now more than a mile apart. You can not buy a postage stamp without walking a mile; you can not register a letter; and the compensation paid for the service rendered in these contract stations everywhere throughout the United States is inadequate for the work performed. If it was for no other purpose than to pay adequate compensation for the work done by the men who occupy these contract stations, there ought to be added appropriations made.

Why, $60,000 worth of stamps are sold in some of these small stations in a year, and if one man occupies the place for any considerable length of time for the performance of that business he is paid $600 a year. He has to pay out more than he gets for clerk hire, and if he by some chance complains because of the inadequacy of the compensation and resigns from the place, why, the Government undertakes to contract with some other man for the performance of the work. It is outrageous to think that a great Government like this would squeeze a man who has to occupy a small place, such as the clerk of a drug store, down to the pay of $100 for performing $60,000 worth of work a year.

In order to increase the number of stations to accommodate the increase of population of these great centers, there ought to be some compensation paid to the men for the work that is done. Fifty thousand dollars is not enough to meet the present needs, but $50,000 is better than nothing, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Beyond the qualification of having served, is there also an examination for that particular branch of the service?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir; and he must have attained a certain rate of efficiency and a certain rank, and he must have been in service a certain length of time, and he must be able to pass the prescribed examination, even after he is designated, in order to be appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is this difference between the selection of a post-office inspector and a selection ordinarily in the civil service elsewhere: Ordinarily under the civil service the Civil Service Commission certifies three men, and you are permitted to make choice amongst the three. Under regulations affecting the post-office inspectors one man applies, and if he passes the necessary examination he may be admitted without competition with anybody else.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true; but after he does apply, I wish to say to my colleague, he can not be designated unless he stands in the rank to which he must have attained before he can be designated.

Mr. LLOYD. That is true; and here is where the difference is with reference to post-office inspectors: The persons that have been designated to take examinations from time to time in recent years have largely been from the dominant party, and that accounts for the fact that at the present time the larger number of post-office inspectors are Republicans.

Mr. MADDEN. If these men who are inspectors in the postal service are like most men who have been employed in the public service elsewhere, whether they went in as Democrats or Republicans, they will find their minds to be of such an elastic character, when the time comes for a change of administration, that they will be able to prove to the incoming administration that they are of its own political faith. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a matter of law, or is it a matter of rule and regulation made by the department?

Mr. MADDEN. It is a matter of rule.

Mr. GARNER. Why is this change made of three in one?

Mr. MADDEN. This is a rule of the department, to select men well qualified for the place. It was made to secure efficient men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The gentleman does not intend to have the House believe that those who seek these contract stations seek them because of the money they make out of handling the Government business. They seek such contract stations because of the advantage they are to them in the particular business in which they are engaged. I do not know of a pharmacist in the city of New York that is not very anxious and willing to have a contract station, because it brings the traffic and the business of the locality to his particular place of business.

Mr. Chairman, what surprises me is the attitude of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. This committee is supposed to have carefully investigated these matters, and with all of the information possible and available, to have made such a recommendation as they believed sufficient to permit the carrying on of the postal service. I do not doubt that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is very familiar with the conditions in Chicago, but I am quite certain he has not submitted any information to this committee that justifies anybody in reaching the conclusion that the recommendation of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is erroneous.

The committee has been very liberal in this bill. I have had it checked up carefully, and it carries $1,929,973 in excess of the estimates for the next fiscal year. I know the report does not indicate that to be the fact——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The bill was changed after the report was made.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York is mistaken, because that is not the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is not mistaken. I have had the calculation made by men who are the most accurate and reliable in this character of business in connection with the House.

Mr. MANN. They have not figured on the estimates, probably.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It could not be true, because the bill does not carry the estimates in lots of places.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will pardon the suggestion, the amount of $281,000,000 comprises the figures given in the estimates, but are not the sum of the items. Now, the gentleman from New York has computed the sum of the items without taking the totals, and so it exceeded the estimates. The estimates give both the items and the totals.

You can not take the totals in that one place and then add some of the items in another place and compare them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unfortunately the committee did not include the limitations in the various paragraphs that would have limited the appropriations in accordance with the intentions of the department.

Mr. MANN. I think they are not in the estimates either.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are in some places at least, because I have a memorandum of them; the bill carries $283,721,481.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, you just got somebody that can not calculate aright within about $3,000,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a difference of $1,973,000. Of course the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee may seem humorous, but, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to place the calculations made by the clerks of the Committee on Appropriations, who are noted for accuracy, against those made by any other clerks in the Government service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the estimates were only $281,000,000 in round figures, and the allowances made through the bill cut the estimates largely, from five hundred to two hundred thousand dollars, how is it possible to make the bill $283,000,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's statement is erroneous, because the bill states in various paragraphs certain totals which are not accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended two or three minutes. I do not care to speak long.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the totals are computed, in accordance with the law, it is found that the bill carries nearly $2,000,000 in excess of the estimates. I have not relied upon any calculations made by myself. I have had the calculations made by the best equipped men in the Government service, and I am willing to rest content upon their calculations, regardless of the indifference of the gentleman from Tennessee to them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I rely upon calculations made by some men in the department just as well equipped as yours.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know, Mr. Chairman, from experience, that the calculations of the departments are not always accurate, and I do know that the calculations made in the place where I have had these made are seldom, if ever, erroneous.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman would tell me who that infallible individual of his is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the two clerks of the Committee on Appropriations. One of them has been connected with the committee 33 years and is well known to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is neither here nor there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Aside from that, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has brought in this recommendation with an increase in this item over the current law by over $100,000, and, without anything being submitted that would influence anybody's judgment, he is willing to accept an amendment to increase the item $50,000 more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Has the gentleman read the hearings on page 25 on this section?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not read them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman ought to know something about that. The gentleman will find the information he requires there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Tennessee has not only read them, but he was present when the testimony was taken, and his committee formed certain conclusions from the consideration of that testimony; and yet, without additional information being submitted, but upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is in my own condition so far as examining the hearings is concerned, the gentleman from Tennessee is willing to increase this item by $50,000 more.

If the recommendations of the committee are of no more value and are not to be any more relied upon in the other instances than they are in this case, I think it would be incumbent upon some Members to examine more carefully the hearings and form their own conclusions rather than attempt to rely upon the recommendations of the committee.

Here is the largest appropriation bill reported to the House carrying $12,000,000 in excess of the current law. It seems to me that after the committee has reached its conclusions and made its recommendations to the House, items should not be increased by consent of the committee except upon submission of information which was not before it, and in the present instance that is not of sufficient weight to justify the House in accepting such amendments.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I know that the gentleman from New York is the guardian of the Treasury. I know that he thinks there is not anybody that knows anything about appropriations or anybody that has got sense enough to make a mathematical calculation correctly except some clerk in his committee. Those things are all patent to us. The arrogance of the gentleman from New York has been apparent to us all from time to time.

I want to commend him, however, for his attempt to keep down appropriations. He knows as well as I do that when this money is appropriated it will be returned to the Treasury if it is not used in the performance of the law. The only point that he has got to make about it is that he wants to keep down the appearances in the matter; that is all.

But if these people in Chicago and New York and elsewhere in our big cities are entitled to this money, I do not feel like taking it away from them. The department has made an estimate. You will find here, on pages 25 and 26, a very careful statement by the assistants in this office and a full review of this whole question. They say they need $320,000. They were asked if they had any basis upon which they could fix the amount. They gave as their reason the natural increase of the business there, and said it would require a great amount of this money, and that the parcel post would require a large amount of it. They were catechized as to the exactness of their information. They could not tell positively. No living man could do it, except, I suppose, somebody on the Committee on Appropriations. They could not tell exactly the amount that would come out of the parcel post and other increases, but they gave the best information they could; and in pursuance of the policy cutting down the appropriations to the extent we thought justifiable, we cut this estimate from $320,000 down to $280,000.

This was the tentative view of the committee. This committee does not assume to say that it was exactly correct on that figure. But when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] came here and stated the conditions in Chicago, his city, and the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated the conditions in his city—and it is fair to assume that the conditions there are the same as in other cities—I think it is just as well to be a little liberal and just in these matters and increase the amount. If we can not and do not go to the full amount that the department estimates, it seems to me this is just, in view of the additional facts brought before the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], because if the money is not needed it will still be in the Treasury.

Mr. GARNER. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois is complaining of a state of facts that now exist under the present appropriation, and in view of the fact that the report shows that they had $78,000 of this fund out of which they could have established these stations, does it seem reasonable or necessary, or will it remedy the situation which the gentleman complains of, to appropriate $50,000 or $500,000, when it is a matter that is the result of the neglect of the department and not for the want of funds? Why increase this appropriation when we have no assurance that the increasing of it will bring the relief sought by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman must not assume, as he does, that it is always a matter of administration in every way simply because gentlemen do not happen to agree politically or in some other way. There is not much wisdom in that. These are people of the United States in these cities, and if the administration has been derelict, as the gentleman thinks it has, and has not given them the accommodation, let us at least make a sufficient appropriation so that the accommodation can be given to the people.

I move that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, exchange, repair, and maintenance of mechanical and labor-saving devices, $50,000.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman whether he does not think that to proceed after a quarter to 6 o'clock on Saturday night is not nearly a violation of the rules of the union? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let us go on until 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the Geographical Society has a dinner to-night, and a great many of the Members desire to go there.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am willing to quit now if you will agree that when we get into the House we may have an understanding that we will meet at 11 o'clock Monday, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Of course we could not make an agreement of that kind in the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will not oppose it——

Mr. MANN. I shall not oppose meeting at 11 o'clock. Monday is District day. What the District Committee will say about it I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay, in his discretion, rewards to postal employees whose inventions are adopted for use in the postal service, and for that purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000 shall be paid for one invention.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent that that paragraph be passed over without prejudice, with the object of preparing an amendment to make it conform with other provisions in other departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read be passed over without prejudice. Does the gentleman mean to be recurred to at the end of the bill?

Mr. MANN. To be recurred to by the committee whenever the chairman desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. On what page is that?

Mr. MANN. The first paragraph on page 14.
Mr. FOWLER. I have no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

That substitute carriers and substitute clerks when assigned to perform the work of regular employees absent on vacations, or when performing auxiliary or temporary work, shall be paid at the rate of 30 cents an hour. Every substitute carrier and substitute post-office clerk who has served as such substitute for a period of one year or more shall, when appointed to a regular position, receive the salary of a second-grade carrier or clerk, $800 per annum, as his initial salary, and all other promotions shall be regulated according to the classification act approved March 2, 1907.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over. I do not care about taking it up now.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any objection to the paragraph?
Mr. COX. I want to get some information.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is entirely new law. It is in the interest of the service. The gentleman can reserve a point of order on it if he wishes.
Mr. COX. I did not reserve any point of order on it.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, $2,285,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.
The motion was agreed to.
The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday morning, and that the House immediately resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock a. m., and that the House then immediately resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.
Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the gentleman that the latter part of his request is objectionable. Monday is District day.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Then just ask to meet at 11 o'clock.
Mr. NORRIS. There are very few Members here, and it is hardly fair to those who are not here, unless they have notice of the meeting at 11 o'clock.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The notice will be given in the RECORD.
Mr. NORRIS. That is a part of the RECORD that Members ordinarily do not pay much attention to.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the gentleman modify his request and make it simply that the House meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.
Mr. NORRIS. I think the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to have actual notice of this.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will simply make the request that we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WEDEMEYER.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 772.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend memorial services for Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, to be held at Ann Arbor, Mich.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this resolution, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
There was no objection.
The resolution was agreed to.
Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Now, Mr. Speaker, I send the following order to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.
The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 16th day of February, 1913, at 12 o'clock, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
The order was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 13, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CULLOM and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ILLINOIS RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have passed the bill (S. 7637) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Illinois River near Havana, Ill. It is somewhat important, owing to the emergency of the situation, that it should be passed at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Vermont, relative to the submission of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution making application to Congress under the provisions of Article V of the Constitution of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall be prohibited.

Whereas it appears from investigation recently made by the Senate of the United States, and otherwise, that polygamy still exists in certain places in the United States, notwithstanding prohibitory statutes enacted by the several States thereof; and

Whereas the practice of polygamy is generally condemned by the people of the United States and there is a demand for the more effectual prohibition thereof by placing the subject under Federal jurisdiction and control, at the same time reserving to each State the right to make and enforce its own laws relating to marriage and divorce: Now therefore

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the application be made, and hereby is made to Congress, under the provisions of Article V of the Constitution of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall be prohibited, and Congress shall be given power to enforce such prohibition by appropriate legislation.

Resolved, That the legislatures of all other States of the United States, now in session or when next convened, be, and they hereby are, respectfully requested to join in this application by the adoption of this or an equivalent resolution.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this application to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the several Members of said bodies representing this State therein; also to transmit copies hereof to the legislatures of all other States of the United States.

FRANK E. HOWE,
President of the Senate.
CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved December 18, 1912.

ALLEN M. FLETCHER, Governor.

STATE OF VERMONT,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of "A joint resolution making application to Congress under the provisions of Article V of the Constitution of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall be prohibited," Approved December 18, 1912, as appears by the files and records of this office.

Witness my signature and the seal of this office, at Montpelier, this 10th day of January, 1913.

[SEAL.] GUY W. BAILEY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of members of the German-American Alliance, of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of the United States Live Stock Sanitary Association, praying that an increased appropriation be made for use of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, in its work toward tick eradication and control and eradication of hog cholera, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and

I submit a report (No. 1104) thereon. I give notice that, if agreeable to the Senate, I will ask consideration of the bill on Wednesday morning next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25878) granting certain lands for a cemetery to the Fort Bidwell People's Church Association, of the town of Fort Bidwell, State of California, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1105) thereon.

JOSEPH W. M'CALL.

Mr. SANDERS. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 20339) for the relief of Joseph W. McCall, and I submit a report (No. 1101) thereon. It is a bill with reference to the term of service of Surg. McCall, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that in the administration of laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon officers of the Volunteer Army in the Civil War, Joseph W. McCall shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as assistant surgeon of the Second Regiment West Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry (subsequently known as the Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry) from the 15th day of September, 1862, to the 15th day of October, 1862, and as assistant surgeon of the same regiment (Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry) from the 1st day of March, 1864, to the 15th day of March, 1864, and to have been honorably discharged from said service on the date hereinbefore last named. But no pay or other allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLICITY OF EVIDENCE.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 8000) providing for publicity in taking evidence under the act of July 2, 1890, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the taking of depositions of witnesses for use in any suit in equity brought by the United States under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, and in the hearings before any examiner or special master appointed to take testimony therein, the proceedings shall be open to the public as freely as are trials in open court; and no order heretofore or hereafter made by any court excluding the public from attendance on any such proceedings shall be valid or enforceable.

The amendment was, in lines 10 and 11, to strike out the words "heretofore or hereafter made by any court."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not care to object, but I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota who has charge of the bill state what particular exigency requires its passage.

Mr. NELSON. The object of the bill is this, Mr. President: In a suit instituted by the Department of Justice against the so-called Boot Machinery Trust in Massachusetts, the judge ordered that the testimony should be taken behind closed doors and refused to take it in public, as has always been done in court heretofore. This is to compel such testimony to be taken in open court, and not behind closed doors.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I believe I will object until I have an opportunity to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas subsequently said: I have now had an opportunity to examine Senate bill 8000, reported by the Senator from Minnesota from the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask permission to withdraw the objection I interposed to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Then, at the instance of the committee, I renew my request for its present consideration.

I wish to state to the Senate that it is important that this bill should pass immediately. It relates to a matter of this kind: A suit was instituted by the Department of Justice under the antitrust law against the Boot Machinery Trust of Boston, and the judge ordered the testimony in that case to be taken behind closed doors. The purpose of the bill is to get rid of the situation and provide that the testimony shall be taken in public. It is important that the law should be passed immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8000) providing for publicity in taking evidence under the act of July 2, 1890. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. NELSON. There is an amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 10 and 11 strike out the words "heretofore or hereafter made by any court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to know more about what this bill is, if the Senator will state it. I did not get the drift of it. A special bill to enable the publicity of testimony is rather an interesting proposition.

Mr. NELSON. A suit was instituted against the Boot Machinery Trust in Massachusetts in the United States court, and the judge of that court ordered that the testimony before the master be taken behind closed doors, not open to the public. The bill provides in all such cases, under the antitrust law, the testimony shall be taken publicly as in open court. It is a bill recommended by the Department of Justice, and the Committee on the Judiciary were unanimously in favor of it. The Senator from Idaho did not happen to be in the committee at the time it was acted on.

Mr. BORAH. Does it appear why the judge ordered the testimony to be taken behind closed doors?

Mr. NELSON. The Attorney General states that fact.

Mr. BORAH. And why was it?

Mr. NELSON. It was in the district court of Massachusetts.

Mr. BORAH. But what I want to know is why the testimony was taken behind closed doors.

Mr. NELSON. That I am unable to say.

Mr. LODGE. The case was before the circuit court in Massachusetts, Judge Putnam presiding, and the testimony was ordered to be taken before a master in the ordinary way. The question arose whether it should be open to the public or not, and the court ruled that it should not be open.

Mr. NELSON. But that it should be taken behind closed doors.

Mr. BORAH. I am still at a loss to know why he did it.

Mr. LODGE. The only ground was that it was not usual.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES.

Mr. CURTIS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 5861) to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose; and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof, and I submit a report (No. 1102) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

Mr. REED. What is the title of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be read.

The Secretary read the bill by title.

Mr. REED. Is the request for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. REED. Has it been granted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been granted.

Mr. REED. For immediate consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For immediate consideration.

Mr. REED. How long has the bill been on the calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported this morning. It has not been on the calendar.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was a moment late in coming to the Chamber. I am heartily in sympathy with many of the objects of the bill, but there are provisions in it revolutionary in character, if the copy which I received through the mails printed on pink paper and sent out by some gentlemen who are interested is correct. I should like to have time to examine the bill, and I hope that the proposer of it will give me time to look into it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator from Missouri taking all the time he desires. I want to say that the committee did not report the bill until after very careful consideration and numerous hearings, and it is a unanimous report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing to have it go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator desires. I do not, of course, wish to have it considered until every Senator is satisfied about the bill.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I ask that it go to the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the Senator will examine the bill. If there is no objection, I should like to call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go to the calendar, but still it can be called up to-morrow.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5379) granting certain lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Washington Historical Society, and I submit a report (No. 1103) thereon.

Mr. JONES. That is a short bill, and is a matter of some urgency. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not like to object, but I think it is rather a bad practice to act on bills as reported, when we have had no opportunity to see the report and it has not been printed, and where no serious harm can follow having the report printed and the bill placed on the calendar so that we may have an opportunity to examine it. I object to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota objects, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 150) appropriating $40,000 for the expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate. The joint resolution relates to the contingent fund of the Senate, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It appropriates $40,000 for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, to be immediately available.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the survey of Nespelem and Omak Townships, on the Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the survey of the Klaxta Township, on the abandoned Spokane Military Reservation, now the Spokane Indian Reservation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for survey of public lands in the State of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MEDALS TO SURVIVORS OF BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 4449) granting an increase of pension to Michael O'Brien, Sixty-second Congress, second session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

THE MONEY TRUST INQUIRY (S. DOC. NO. 1003).

Mr. BURTON. I ask to have printed as a Senate document copies of letters to the New York Evening Post, by A. Piatt Andrew, containing some facts and findings relating to the Money Trust inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, an order for the printing of the letters is entered.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to state that during the Sixty-second Congress there died 16 Representatives, 5 Senators, and our Vice President. The eulogies on the lives and public services of the departed have not been delivered in the Senate, with the exception of those in relation to the late Senator Frye, of Maine. If the eulogies are to be printed at this session of Congress, memorial services should be held at an early date, and arrangements for that purpose should be made, because there are some twenty or more of them. I simply call attention to this fact so that Senators who may be interested may arrange a time at a very early date for the delivery of those eulogies.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of what is know as the omnibus claims bill, House bill 19115.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the pending question is upon the amendment which I proposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], seeking to incorporate into the bill what are known as the French spoliation claims. I now ask that the vote be taken upon the amendment offered by me to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator through for the present?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am going to occupy a very few moments in a discussion of this matter. On one or two previous occasions I spoke at some length in favor of the so-called French spoliation claims. I have not changed my mind on the subject at all, and I only desire to briefly restate my position.

These claims are very old; they are sometimes called stale; but I believe a claim never becomes stale that is pressed from time to time before the Congress; it becomes old but not stale, and the fact that these claims are very old is, to my mind, an added reason why they should be paid, provided they are honest claims.

Mr. President, I am not going to weary the Senate in going over the facts concerning these claims, the facts being well known to the Members of the Senate and to the country at large. From my point of view, the Government, in honor and in fairness, is bound to pay them.

In looking over the RECORD a few days ago I found that there have been 63 favorable reports made by committees of Congress on these claims. In three of those instances there was an adverse minority report, and there have been three adverse reports made during this more than 100 years. The total amount of the claims, as I recall, was between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 of which between three and four million dollars have been paid, and there remain unpaid somewhere from six to eight hundred thousand dollars. If the payment of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 was a correct payment, the payment of the six or eight hundred thousand dollars remaining must be equally correct; and I have been unable to discover any difference between the claims that have been paid and the claims that remain unpaid.

The first time I ever heard this matter discussed was in the House of Representatives in 1888. The Senator now occupying the chair [Mr. SHIVELY], as I recall, was a colleague of mine in the House at that time. Mr. Hooker, of Mississippi, a very able Representative, made a speech of some considerable length on the question, and I want to quote very briefly from what Mr. Hooker said. It impressed me then. I had not examined the matter very carefully up to that time, and it led me to take a very great interest in the matter, and, as some of these claims were from my own section of the country, I studied the subject as well as I could, and came to the conclusion then, which I still hold, that it is a great injustice to refuse to pay the remnant of these claims. Mr. Hooker said:

> If we have allowed decade after decade to pass, from 1801 down to the present time, if we have allowed generation after generation to pass away who were entitled to these claims, the original claimants and their descendants, is it any argument to the enlightened conscience and to the just sense of right of an American Congress to say that because we have persisted in wrong for nearly 100 years therefore we should persist in it for another 100 years? I say to these gentlemen whose names are recorded in favor of the law giving the Court of Claims the right of jurisdiction upon this question, if you did not intend to make a promise to the ear which was to be broken to the hope, if you did not intend that, then you ought to have raised all these objections when that bill was pending in this House, and you ought to have voted down the proposition to refer these matters to the Court of Claims, because, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, you were referring to that court claims the subject matter of which had no value, and the assumed beneficiaries of which were nefarious claimants of something to which they had no right.
> Yet the finding of your court answers him. Your tribunal, composed of five enlightened and able jurists, sitting for long weeks and months upon these cases, taking proof for the claimants and proof for the Government, tell you that certain of these claims which they have investigated are just, valid, subsisting claims against the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I recall that speech to-day as vividly as it came to me at the time it was uttered in the House of Representatives; the discussion was one of great interest; and I was then persuaded that the Government was in honor bound to pay these claimants, and, as I said a moment ago, I have not been able to divest my mind of that feeling from that day to this. We referred the claims to the Court of Claims; the Court of Claims investigated them and reported them back to Congress as being just claims; and yet we have haggled over them year after year and decade after decade, and a portion of the claims remain unpaid to the present time, which is not to our credit from any point of view.

I trust, Mr. President, that as the Court of Claims found the full amount due as recognized in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, the motion made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to reduce the amount may not prevail, and that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts may receive the sanction of the Senate. As I said a moment ago, if the three or four million dollars that we have paid has been justly and honestly and honorably paid, we are equally in duty bound to pay the six or eight hundred thousand dollars that remain unpaid, and it is time that the Senate did its full duty in this matter. That is all I care to say, Mr. President.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, when this bill was before the Senate several days ago I put a question to the chairman of the committee when he was cut off by the arrival of the hour of 1 o'clock. That question I will repeat, in order that what he may say shall be understood.

As I understand, several million dollars of these French spoliation claims have been paid.

Mr. LODGE. Between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

Mr. ROOT. Between three and four million dollars, the Senator from Massachusetts says. That payment seems to me, coming as it did at different times, the judgments of successive Congresses upon the principle. It seemed to me that no one was at liberty to dispute the soundness and the equity of these claims in the face of the repeated decisions leading to those payments, unless he had himself made a thorough and exhaustive study of the subject and had come to a different conclusion. I think failing that, we are all bound to accept the decision already reached by Congress as stating the principle. That would leave nothing but the question of the amount, and the amount in the cases now before us has been settled by the judgments of the Court of Claims.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Settled on exactly the same basis on which the previous claims were settled.

Mr. ROOT. I so understand. Now, my question to the chairman of the committee was whether the principle has not been settled in favor of these claimants so that we can proceed to act according to our conscience in regard to payments of the amounts which have been fixed upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. CRAWFORD. These French spoliation claims have met with favorable action on the part of Congress in three several appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Four.

Mr. CRAWFORD. One approved by President Harrison; one by President McKinley—possibly two by President McKinley—and one by President Roosevelt; I am not sure; possibly three or four. They came before Congress as items in general appropriation bills of some sort, and were not presented as independent propositions resting alone and discussed alone.

Before that time there had been bills presented for their allowance which were vetoed. President Cleveland vetoed one of these bills, and he placed his objection largely upon the ground that the claims contained what he thought were excessive amounts which they asked to be reimbursed on account of what they had paid as insurance premiums for insurance to cover this property and profits in the nature of freight earnings.

Now, we had the same question up two years ago in an omnibus claims bill, and it was discussed for several weeks in the Senate. The bill containing the French spoliation claims passed the Senate and went to the House, and there it was defeated. The entire bill was defeated on account of the very decided hostility to the items in that bill appropriating money for French spoliation claims. When the subject of presenting the present bill, which passed the House without the French spoliation claims in it, came up before the Committee on Claims the whole question was discussed whether or not the French spoliation claims should be incorporated in this bill.

As is well known, upon the general principle of obligation to satisfy these claims my own judgment was in recognition of the principle of payment. But I was only one member of the committee. The hostility to the claims on the question of incorporating them into the bill which passed the House was so marked and so decided that it looked like utter failure for the whole bill from the beginning if what are known as the French spoliation claims were incorporated in it. The matter was submitted to the committee, and after very careful consideration and on account of the situation—the sharp difference of opinion, the positive, agressive opposition to these claims—the majority of the committee decided that it was inexpedient and unwise to attempt to incorporate those claims as an amendment upon the House bill. I am trying in good faith to execute the instructions which I received from this committee.

Now, as to the merits of the case, speaking particularly in regard to the amendment which I have proposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish to say this: It is undoubtedly true that in conventions and under previous adjudications that have occurred, items such as these claims for freight earnings and insurance premiums have been allowed. I do not think, however, that the situations are exactly similar, because in most of those instances we were dealing directly with a foreign nation and it was a matter of settlement and adjustment between the Government of the United States and a foreign power direct; and in one of the instances which the Senator from Massachusetts presented the other day, as he said, a lump sum was paid over to the United States much in excess of the amount of these individual claims, and the Government had this fund at its disposal and it was quite liberal in paying out to the claimants and reimbursing them for items such as insurance premiums, no matter how large, and freight earnings, and things of that kind.

I do not believe that there has been established any binding precedent which in any way ties the hands of the Congress of the United States in the matter of simply doing what it may decide is fair and reasonable justice in this particular case. These findings that come here from the Court of Claims are not judgments. The cases were sent over there for them to report findings simply for the advisory use that might be made of them by the Congress of the United States. That is all. They are findings which come to us in an advisory way.

So, while I recognize from my standpoint that a great many very just claims are here, can it be said because we have this finding we must in honor pay these claims? Let me call attention to the case of the brig Sally, John V. Villett, master. Here was a brig engaged in the slave trade. She purchased a cargo of slaves on the Gold Coast. Her master purchased a cargo of slaves and set sail for Savannah, Ga., intending to stop at St. Thomas, West Indies, for supplies. On March 6, 1797, she was seized by a French privateer and taken to Guadeloupe, where both vessel and cargo were condemned by a French prize tribunal and became a total loss to the owner. The governor of this island took possession of these slaves, 167 of them, and put them to work on government plantations there.

Now, here more than 100 years after, in the twentieth century, we are asked to pay descendants for their loss on freight earnings on 167 negroes—to reimburse them the freight earnings for the loss, because they were seized by the government of those islands in the West Indies. Is there any moral obligation, is there any obligation whatever, resting upon us of this time to pay the descendants of that old slaver for what was lost on the freight on human beings from the west coast of Africa?

Mr. LODGE. That slave case is becoming quite familiar, but is that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. LODGE. But does that apply to many cases?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows, as I said to him the other day, that the Senator from Massachusetts does not advocate any such claim.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that very well.

Here is another man who had a cargo of freight, and he paid 30 per cent premium for insurance on it. It was on its way to the West Indies, and was seized by a privateer. The cargo and the vessel were taken. Through some adjustment with the insurance company he got back every dollar of his loss. They paid him for the merchandise. They paid him for the vessel itself.

Now, if that was a transaction with the insurance company, he could not make them pay back the premium he had paid for his protection, could he? No; that is what he paid for his protection, and he got his loss absolutely repaid. But a hundred years later his children or his grandchildren want us to pay back that premium of 30 per cent.

I do not care anything about the Geneva award or some convention between this country and Spain or any other foreign power. I say as a matter of simple justice between the United States and its own citizens, are we obliged, in order to do justice, to pay the grandchildren of those losers of insurance premiums? Here is a company of underwriters that took 60 per cent premium for insuring this property, and when the loss occurred they paid the loss. My amendment would allow the claimants to be repaid the amount they paid in insurance, but not allow them to retain the enormous premium of 60 per cent that they exacted at the time they insured the property.

I thought under the circumstances it was no more than fair to at least submit this amendment of mine, which seeks to cut out freight earnings and insurance premiums, and confine the losses to actual property losses—I thought it was no more than fair to the Senate to segregate those items and give the Senate an opportunity to say whether or not in its judgment the insurance premiums and the prospective profits, or the freight earnings should be included in the amount that these people should receive; and that is what the pending amendment provides.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do, but I desire to say again that if we are ever to have a vote on this proposition we ought to have it soon, because the appropriation bills are coming in and they will have the right of way.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to ask how long these people have waited for a settlement——

Mr. CRAWFORD. That appears on the face of the record.

Mr. OWEN. I know, but how long——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Since the early part of the last century; and I am bound to say they have been diligent. That is all I care to say. Can we not have a vote, Mr. President?

Mr. LODGE. Upon the matter of the precedents in Congress, the Senator said three. There are four, as I thought, and I want to put them into the RECORD at a convenient point. Congress has heretofore by appropriation allowed the following amounts:

March 3, 1891 (Fifty-first Congress), $1,304,095.37. The bill was signed by President Harrison.

March 3, 1899 (Fifty-sixth Congress), $1,055,473.04. The bill was signed by President McKinley.

May 27, 1902 (Fifty-seventh Congress), $798,631.27.

February 24, 1905 (Fifty-eighth Congress), $752,660.93.

Total, $3,910,860.61.

That makes four payments on these claims already made by previous Congresses and made on the same basis as those now presented; made on findings of the Court of Claims, which differs in no respects of which I am aware from the findings here.

For that reason I object to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. If the claims are to be paid, this amendment differentiates this vast group from all the others that have gone before.

Now, Mr. President, there is one case of a slaver that I think should be omitted. I do not believe, even if it is technically correct, that we need pay old claims for the transportation of slaves. But, Mr. President, that is but one case. The total amount is not large, and it is only one case among a great many. I desire to say just a word in regard to that matter of premiums. It is not possible for me to say it now, although I shall not take three minutes. But I want to say a word about the question of premiums which the Senator from South Dakota raised, and I hope the Senator will allow the bill to go over, as we only have two minutes now before the impeachment case comes up.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am very anxious to get a vote on the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator must see it is impossible to get a vote now.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin, of counsel for the respondent, appeared.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last session of the Senate sitting for the consideration of the articles of impeachment.

The Journal of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment on Saturday last was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I offer an order which I have handed to the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York proposes the following order, which will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment successively, and when the reading of each article is concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:

"Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?"

Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called and each Senator, as his name is called, shall arise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the order. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the order is unanimously adopted. The Secretary will read the first article of impeachment.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, if I may do so properly, I desire at this time to ask to be excused from voting upon the articles of impeachment. I was unavoidably detained from the Senate until the adjournment for the Christmas holidays, so that I did not see or hear the witnesses who were examined up to that time. While I have read the testimony and statement of counsel and heard the arguments, I do not feel that I can vote without at least taking the judgment of the Senate upon the question as to whether I may properly do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the Senate will excuse him from voting upon the articles of impeachment for the reason he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Indiana is excused.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, owing to a protracted illness I was detained at my home in Vermont throughout the entire month of December. I heard none of the testimony that was offered in support of the articles of impeachment, nor have I been able by reason of other engagements to read the same since that time. I count myself as entirely disqualified to pass upon any question involved here to-day. For this reason I ask to be excused from voting on any one of the articles of impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that he be excused from voting on the articles of impeachment for the reason he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, during the session up to the holiday adjournment I was, unfortunately, ill and not able to be here. I have not had time since I came back to read the testimony with that care with which I think it ought to be read, and I ask the Senate to excuse me from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks to be excused from voting on the articles of impeachment for the reason he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

The Chair will state that two other Senators have previously had practically the consent of the Senate to be excused from voting, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. HEISKELL] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON], both of whom came into the Senate near the close of the impeachment proceedings.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I believe I will ask the Senate to excuse me from voting on the counts which involve incriminating facts alleged to have occurred during the term of the respondent as United States district judge. I have not had sufficient time to convince my own mind that I ought to vote on those counts. I feel definitely well advised as to what I shall do with reference to the matters which transpired while he was judge of the Commerce Court. I think it is proper at this time to ask to be excused from voting on those counts which relate to the conduct of the respondent as judge of the district court, and I prefer that request now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the Senate excuse him from voting upon the articles indicated by him for the reason he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as is known to Senators, I have been unable to attend the sessions of the Senate as I should like to have done. I am not prepared to vote on any article but the first one, and I ask to be excused from voting on all the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that he be excused from voting upon all the articles of impeachment save only the first one, for the reason stated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from South Carolina is excused as requested.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, owing to the fact that I came into the Senate very recently and have been very busy with the details of my office, having heard practically none of the evidence or arguments in the case, I should like to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks that he may be excused from voting upon the articles of impeachment, for the reason which he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

The Secretary will proceed to read the first article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, being a United States circuit judge, and having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and being then and there a judge of the said court, on March 31, 1911, entered into an agreement with one Edward J. Williams whereby the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams agreed to become partners in the purchase of a certain culm dump, commonly known as the Katydid culm dump, near Moosic, Pa., owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation, and one John M. Robertson, for the purpose of disposing of said property at a profit. That pursuant to said agreement, and in furtherance thereof, the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence, and did induce and influence, the officers of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and of the Erie Railroad Co., a corporation, which owned all of the stock of said coal company, to enter into an agreement with the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams to sell the interest of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid culm dump for a consideration of $4,500. That during the period covering the several negotiations and transactions leading up to the aforesaid agreement the said Robert W. Archbald was a judge of the United States Commerce Court, duly designated and acting as such judge; and at the time aforesaid and during the time the aforesaid negotiations were in progress the said Erie Railroad Co. was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce and was a party litigant in certain suits, to wit, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 39, then pending in the United States Commerce Court; and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing these facts, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly took advantage of his official position as such judge to induce and influence the officials of the said Erie Railroad Co. and the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation thereof, to enter into a contract with him and the said Edward J. Williams, as aforesaid, for profit to themselves, and that the said Robert W. Archbald then and there, through the influence exerted by reason of his position as such judge, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did induce the officers of said Erie Railroad Co. and of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to enter into said contract for the consideration aforesaid.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the vote on this article the Chair would request the Senate to excuse the present occupant of the Chair from voting for reasons which will readily occur to Senators, and which attach to him as the Presiding Officer during the trial, except in the case of an article where his vote may affect the result. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair will exercise that privilege, with the permission of the Senate.

The Chair now submits article 1 to the judgment of the Senate.

Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I desire again to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness and of death in his family.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is also absent on account of illness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is necessarily detained from the city.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GARDNER] is necessarily detained from the Chamber.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent owing to illness in his family.

Mr. SANDERS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. LEA] is unavoidably absent from the city.

Mr. CATRON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. FALL] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I received a telegram from my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], dated New Orleans, Saturday, stating that he was there on the Mexican investigation and could not therefore be present in the Senate at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY] is out of the city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears from the responses given by Senators that 68 Senators have voted "guilty" and 5 Senators have voted "not guilty." More than two-thirds of the Senators having voted "guilty," the Senate adjudges the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty as charged in the first article of impeachment.

The Secretary will now read the second article of impeachment.

The Secretary proceeded to read article 2.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate close the doors and go into secret session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a point of order. The Senate has already decided to vote at this hour on the articles of impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true, and in the absence of any order to the contrary that order would undoubtedly be carried out. It is, however, for the Senate to determine whether it will at any time suspend that order. It is not a matter of unanimous consent, but it is an order which can be changed or not changed, as the Senate may see proper to do.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, before the question is put, I ask, if the motion be carried, whether it will result in excluding counsel for the respondent from the Senate Chamber?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; it would, while the Senate was in secret deliberation, exclude everybody except Senators and those who are privileged under such circumstances.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I trust that nothing will be done which will exclude counsel for the respondent while the vote is being taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will be no vote taken in secret session; there can not be. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to now close the doors.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Could voting continue in secret session upon counts or issues raised?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There can be no vote except in open session.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Has the Chair just stated that the Senate could not vote upon these articles in secret session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It could not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senate has, I believe, by unanimous consent, fixed this hour for voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has done so by order, not by unanimous consent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was by order that the Senate met in open session. My understanding was that there was a unanimous-consent agreement that we should vote at 1 o'clock to-day.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand that all we could do in secret session would be to consider the question as to whether it is worth while to go on with the vote on these other charges, and it was only with a view of saving time in that way, we having disposed of the matter by a vote on one article, that I made the suggestion. If the Senate is willing, I will withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia withdraws the motion. The Secretary will read the second article of impeachment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that there be order in the Chamber and in the galleries during this proceeding, which is a solemn and very serious one, indeed. Those who are here by the courtesy of the Senate, I think, while the articles are being read and voted on, should maintain the strictest order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is eminently proper. The Chair particularly requests visitors not by any conversation or otherwise to disturb the entire quietude and solemnity of these proceedings.

The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the second article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 2.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 1st day of August, 1911, was a United States circuit judge, and, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, was then and there a judge of said court.

That at the time aforesaid the Marian Coal Co., a corporation, was the owner of a certain culm bank at Taylor, Pa., and was then and there engaged in the business of washing and shipping coal; that prior to that time the said Marian Coal Co. had filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission a complaint against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and five other railroad companies as defendants, charging said defendants with discrimination in rates and with excessive charges for the transportation of coal shipped by the said Marian Coal Co. over their respective lines of road; that all of the said defendant companies were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. That the decision of the said case by the Interstate Commerce Commission at the instance of either party thereto was subject to a review, under the law, by the United States Commerce Court; that one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland were then the principal stockholders of the said Marian Coal Co. and controlled the operation of the same, and they, the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, employed one George M. Watson as an attorney to settle the case then pending as aforesaid in the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co.; and at the time aforesaid there was pending in the United States Commerce Court a certain suit entitled "The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38," to which suit the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party litigant.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being judge as aforesaid and well knowing these facts, did then and there engage for a consideration to assist the said George M. Watson to settle the aforesaid case then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. the said two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co., and in pursuance of said engagement the said Robert W. Archbald, on or about the 10th day of August, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise to induce and influence the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with the said George M. Watson for the settlement of the aforesaid case and the sale of said stock of the Marian Coal Co.; and the said Robert W. Archbald thereby willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as such judge in the attempt to settle said case and to sell said stock of the said Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I ask to be excused from voting, for I have not reached a conclusion satisfactory to myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to excusing the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and he stands excused.

The roll call was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the vote.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate upon the question whether the respondent is guilty or not guilty under the charge in this article, those voting guilty number 46 and those voting not guilty number 25. Forty-eight would be the number necessary to make two-thirds. Less than two-thirds having voted in favor of the guilt of the respondent, the Senate adjudges that he is not guilty as charged in this article.

The Secretary will proceed to read the third article of impeachment.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about October 1, 1911, did secure from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., a corporation, which coal company was then and there owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and which railroad company was at that time a party litigant in certain suits then pending in the United States Commerce Court, to wit: The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 38, and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 49, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald, an agreement which permitted said Robert W. Archbald and his associates to lease a culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, near Shenandoah, in the State of Pennsylvania, which said culm dump contained a large amount of coal, to wit, 472,670 tons, and which said culm dump the said Robert W. Archbald and his associates agreed to operate and to ship the product of the same exclusively over the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; and that the said Robert W. Archbald unlawfully and corruptly did use his official position and influence as such judge to secure from the said coal company the said agreement.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a misdemeanor in such office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). Mr. President, I ask to be excused from voting on this article, as I have not been able to reach a conclusion satisfactory to myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks to be excused from voting on this article for the reasons stated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

The roll call was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate, 60 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 11 Senators have responded that he is not guilty as charged in this article. More than two-thirds of the Senate having responded that he is guilty, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, is guilty as charged in this article.

The Secretary will proceed to read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 4.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States circuit judge and being a member of the United States Commerce Court, was and is guilty of gross and improper conduct, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor as said circuit judge and as a member of said Commerce Court in manner and form as follows, to wit: Prior to and on the 4th day of April, 1911, there was pending in said United States Commerce Court the suit of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. Said suit was argued and submitted to said United States Commerce Court on the 4th day of April, 1911; that afterwards, to wit, on the 22d day of August, 1911, while said suit was still pending in said court, and before the same had been decided, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully did write a letter to the attorney for the said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. requesting said attorney to see one of the witnesses who had testified in said suit on behalf of said company and to get his explanation and interpretation of certain testimony that the said witness had given in said suit, and communicate the same to the said Robert W. Archbald, which request was complied with by said attorney; that afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of January, 1912, while said suit was still pending, and before the same had been decided by said court, the said Robert W. Archbald, as judge of said court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully again did write to the said attorney that other members of said United States Commerce Court had discovered evidence on file in said suit detrimental to the said railroad company and contrary to the statements and contentions made by the said attorney; and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge of said United States Commerce Court as aforesaid, in said letter requested the said attorney to make to him, the said Robert W. Archbald, an explanation and an answer thereto; and he, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court aforesaid, did then and there request and solicit the said attorney for the said railroad company to make and deliver to the said Robert W. Archbald a further argument in support of the contentions of the said attorney so representing the said railroad company, which request was complied with by said attorney, all of which on the part of said Robert W. Archbald was done secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and which was without the knowledge or consent of the said Interstate Commerce Commission or its attorneys.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate, 52 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty and 20 Senators have voted that he is not guilty. More than two-thirds having voted that he is guilty, the Senate decides that Robert W. Archbald is guilty as charged in this article.

The Secretary will read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 5.

That in the year 1904 one Frederick Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in a lease on certain coal lands owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., located near Lorberry Junction, in said State, and put up a number of improvements thereon and operated a culm dump located on said property for several years thereafter; that operations were carried on at a loss; that said Frederick Warnke thereupon applied to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. for the mining maps of the said land covered by the said lease, and was informed that the lease under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before it was assigned to him, and his application for said maps was therefore denied; that said Frederick Warnke then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under the said lease, provided that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would give him an operating lease on what was known as the Lincoln culm bank, located near Lorberry; that said George F. Baer referred said proposition to one W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action; that the general policy of the said coal company being adverse to the lease of any of its culm banks, the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards declined to make the lease, and the said Frederick Warnke was so advised; that the said Frederick Warnke then made several attempts, through his attorneys and friends, to have the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards reconsider their decision in the premises, but without avail; that on or about November 1, 1911, the said Frederick Warnke called upon Robert W. Archbald, who was then and now is a United States circuit judge, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and asked him, the said Robert W. Archbald, to intercede in his behalf with the said W. J. Richards; that on November 24, 1911, the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, pursuant to said request, did write a letter to the said W. J. Richards requesting an appointment with the said W. J. Richards; that several days thereafter the said Robert W. Archbald called at the office of the said W. J. Richards to intercede for the said Frederick Warnke; that the said W. J. Richards then and there informed the said Robert W. Archbald that the decision which he had given to the said Warnke must be considered as final, and the said Archbald so informed the said Warnke; that the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which also owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which last-named company is a common carrier engaged in interstate business.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing all the aforesaid facts, did wrongfully attempt to use his influence as such judge to aid and assist the said Frederick Warnke to secure an operating lease of the said Lincoln culm dump, owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., as aforesaid, which lease the officials of the said Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had theretofore refused to grant, which said fact was also well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, shortly after the conclusion of his attempted negotiations with the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., aforesaid, in behalf of the said Frederick Warnke, and on or about the 31st day of March, 1912, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did accept, as a gift, reward, or present, from the said Frederick Warnke, tendered in consideration of favors shown him by said judge in his efforts to secure a settlement and agreement with the said railroad company and the said coal company, and for other favors shown by said judge to the said Frederick Warnke, a certain promissory note for $500 executed by the firm of Warnke & Co., of which the said Frederick Warnke was a member.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as a judge and high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the Senate, 66 Senators have upon this article voted that the respondent is guilty and 6 Senators have voted that he is not guilty. More than two-thirds of the Senators having voted that the respondent is guilty, the Senate has decided that he is guilty as charged in this article.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I have been advised that occupants of the galleries wish to retire, and I would suggest that they be permitted to do so, even if not permitted to return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Permission will be given as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky for those who wish to retire to do so in an orderly way without confusion.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, we have been here for a good while and we are not half through these article. The occupants of the galleries may be restless, and some of us are getting pretty hungry. I wish to suggest that we suspend the calling of the roll for half an hour that we may get our lunch and then come back again. I move that the Senate take a recess until a quarter of 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what hour?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Until 15 minutes before 3.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota moves that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock and 45 minutes.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 6.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, did unlawfully, improperly, and corruptly attempt to use his influence as such judge with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to induce the officers of said companies to purchase a certain interest in a tract of coal land containing 800 acres, which interest at said time belonged to certain persons known as the Everhardt heirs.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POINDEXTER (when his name was called). I ask to be excused from voting on this article. I have not been able to examine the evidence so as to reach a satisfactory conclusion upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks that he be excused, for the reason indicated by him, from voting on this article. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Upon this article my mind is not clear and I have reached no satisfactory conclusion. I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks to be excused from voting, for the reason assigned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he stands excused.

The roll call was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll, 24 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty under the charges in this article and 45 Senators have voted that he is not guilty. Less than two-thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, is not guilty as charged in the article.

Mr. STONE. Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 relate to charges of misbehavior alleged against the respondent while he was district judge. Some time ago he left that office, and he is not now holding it. I therefore ask to be excused from voting on those articles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks to be excused from voting on the articles named by him for the reasons he has assigned.

Mr. KENYON. I inquire what are the reasons? We could not hear the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will please restate his reasons.

Mr. STONE. I say, I have not reached a conclusion satisfactory to myself as to whether these alleged offenses could be reached by impeachment. I therefore ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks to be excused from voting upon the articles he has enumerated for the reasons assigned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am similarly situated as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I have not been able to reach a conclusion satisfactory to myself as to whether charges specifying offenses prior to the appointment of the respondent as a circuit judge can be tried under this impeachment. Consequently I ask to be excused from voting on articles 7, 8, and 9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks to be excused from voting on the articles enumerated by him for the reasons he has assigned. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

The Secretary will proceed to read the next article of impeachment.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 7.

That during the months of October and November, A. D. 1908, there was pending in the United States district court, in the city of Scranton, State of Pennsylvania, over which court Robert W. Archbald was then presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a suit or action at law, wherein the Old Plymouth Coal Co. was plaintiff and the Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Co. was defendant. That the said coal company was principally owned and entirely controlled by one W. W. Rissinger, which fact was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; that on or about November 1, 1908, and while said suit was pending, the said Robert W. Archbald and the said W. W. Rissinger wrongfully and corruptly agreed together to purchase stock in a gold-mining scheme in Honduras, Central America, for the purpose of speculation and profit; that in order to secure the money with which to purchase said stock, the said Rissinger executed his promissory note in the sum of $2,500, payable to Robert W. Archbald and Sophia J. Hutchison, which said note was indorsed then and there by the said Robert W. Archbald, for the purpose of having same discounted for cash; that one of the attorneys for said Rissinger in the trial of said suit was one John T. Lenahan; that on the 23d day of November, 1908, said suit came on for trial before said Robert W. Archbald, judge presiding, and a jury, and after the plaintiff's evidence was presented the defendant insurance company demurred to the sufficiency of said evidence and moved for a nonsuit, and, after extended argument by attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant, the said Robert W. Archbald ruled against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce evidence, before the conclusion of which the jury was dismissed and a consent judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, to be discharged upon the payment of $2,129.63 if paid within 15 days from November 23, 1908, and on the same day judgments were entered in a number of other like suits against different insurance companies, which resulted in the recovery of about $28,000 by the Old Plymouth Coal Co.; that before the expiration of said 15 days the said Rissinger, with the knowledge and consent of said Robert W. Archbald, presented said note to the said John T. Lenahan for discount, which was refused, and which was later discounted by a bank and has never been paid.

All of which acts on the part of said Robert W. Archbald were improper, unbecoming, and constituted misbehavior in his said office as judge, and render him guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed with the call of the roll of Senators for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). Upon this article I vote "not guilty," and I file, to be printed in the RECORD, my reasons for so doing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the Senator has that privilege.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I file a statement of my views on this and succeeding articles down to and including article 12. On this article I vote "not guilty."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I vote "guilty," and I desire to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is not permitted under the rule to make any statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thought we could make a statement of one minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. Then, I ask the privilege of filing my reasons hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That privilege has already been granted.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am going to ask to be excused from voting on this article and the remainder of the articles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will limit his present request to this article, as the roll is now being called on that.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not been able to reach a conclusion satisfactory to myself regarding this article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks to be excused from voting upon this article for the reason stated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. SIMMONS. I vote "not guilty," but I desire to inquire whether, under the order adopted by the Senate, I can file my reasons hereafter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an order to that effect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I ask to be excused from voting upon this article, as I have not reached a conclusion as to whether these acts done prior to the occupancy of the defendant of a seat on the Commerce Court can now be the subject of impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks to be excused from voting upon this article for the reason assigned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). As I am undecided in my own mind in regard to this article, I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks to be excused, for the reason assigned by him, from voting upon this article. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. WORKS (when his name was called). I vote "not guilty," and, as provided for by the order of the Senate, I now file my reasons for my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

Foster	Kern	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll, 29 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 36 Senators have voted that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article. Less than two-thirds having voted in favor of guilt, the Senate has adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article.

During the roll call the following statements were filed:

By Mr. BORAH: In voting not guilty upon those counts which charge misconduct at a time when said R. W. Archbald was district judge, an office which he no longer holds, I do so because of a doubt I entertain as to the law. I am not prepared to say we can not impeach a man for offenses or acts committed while holding an office which he no longer holds. But the legal proposition, to my mind, is involved in doubt. Furthermore, if we had a clear and undoubted right as a legal proposition to do so, I would hesitate to establish the precedent except upon a peculiar and extraordinary necessity. I am not willing under the circumstances of this case, the object of the impeachment being fully accomplished, to establish that precedent. I prefer to leave it open until expediency demands that the matter be definitely decided. I have not, therefore, undertaken to pass upon the facts supporting the counts, but determine the matter solely upon the doubt which I entertain as to the law and as to the propriety of exercising the power, even if we have it under such conditions as exist in this case.

By Mr. BRYAN: I am convinced that articles of impeachment lie only for conduct during the term of office then being filled, and that the "good behavior" required by the Constitution relates to the future and not to the past; to what the officer does after and not to what the citizen had done before he is nominated and confirmed.

Both the President when he nominates and the Senate when it advises and consents ought to be satisfied, it seems to me, with the character and qualifications of the citizen.

The primary object of an impeachment is removal from office, but this could not be attained if before that the office became vacant.

Taking this view, I vote to acquit the respondent on articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask to be excused from voting on each of the other articles where they involve acts prior to the respondent's appointment to the Commerce Court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please indicate the numbers of the articles.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are the ones immediately following down to article 13. I ask to be excused from voting for the reason that I gave a few moments ago on the seventh article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks to be excused from voting on the articles indicated by him for the reason he has given. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask to be excused from voting upon the same articles as those indicated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] for the same reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks to be excused from voting upon the articles indicated for the reason assigned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I make a similar request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks to be excused from voting upon the articles indicated for the reason assigned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

The Secretary will proceed to read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 8.

That during the summer and fall of the year 1909 there was pending in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton, over which court the said Robert W. Archbald was then and there presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a civil action wherein the Marian Coal Co. was defendant, which action involved a large sum of money, and which defendant coal company was principally owned and controlled by one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; and while said suit was so pending the said Robert W. Archbald drew a note for $500 payable to himself, and which note was signed by one John Henry Jones and indorsed by the said Robert W. Archbald, and then and there during the pendency of said suit as aforesaid the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully agreed and consented that the said note should be presented to the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, for the purpose of having the said note discounted, corruptly intending that his name on said note would coerce and induce the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, to discount the same because of the said Robert W. Archbald's position as judge and because the said Bolands were at that time litigants in his said court.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his office as judge, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the vote.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate, 22 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 42 Senators have voted that he is not guilty as charged in this article. The Senate has therefore adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article. The Secretary will proceed to read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 9.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, of the city of Scranton and State of Pennsylvania, on or about November 1, 1909, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton and State aforesaid, did draw a note in his own proper handwriting, payable to himself, in the sum of $500, which said note was signed by one John Henry Jones, which said note the said Robert W. Archbald indorsed for the purpose of securing the sum of $500, and the said Robert W. Archbald, well knowing that his indorsement would not secure money in the usual commercial channels, then and there wrongfully did permit the said John Henry Jones to present said note for discount, at his law office, to one C. H. Von Storch, attorney at law and practitioner in said district court, which said Von Storch, a short time prior thereto, was a party defendant in a suit in the said district court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald, which said suit was decided in favor of the said Von Storch upon a ruling by the said Robert W. Archbald; and when the said note was presented to the said Von Storch for discount, as aforesaid, the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully and improperly used his influence as such judge to induce the said Von Storch to discount same; that the said note was then and there discounted by the said Von Storch, and the same has never been paid but is still due and owing.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his said office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to call the names of Senators for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I vote "not guilty" on this article, and take this opportunity of filing my reasons under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views filed by the Senator from Connecticut will be printed in the RECORD.

The roll call was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of the Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate, 23 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 39 Senators have voted that he is not guilty as charged in this article. The Senate therefore has adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article.

During the calling of the roll the following statement was filed:

By Mr. BRANDEGEE: I vote "not guilty" on articles 7 to 12, inclusive, because I do not think that impeachment will lie for offenses alleged to have been committed by the respondent while holding an office which he does not now hold and did not hold at the time the articles of impeachment were adopted by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 10.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully did accept and receive a large sum of money, the exact amount of which is unknown to the House of Representatives, from one Henry W. Cannon; that said money so given by the said Henry W. Cannon and so unlawfully and wrongfully received and accepted by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, was for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a pleasure trip of the said Robert W. Archbald to Europe; that the said Henry W. Cannon, at the time of the giving of said money and the receipt thereof by the said Robert W. Archbald, was a stockholder and officer in various and divers interstate railway corporations, to wit: A director in the Great Northern Railway; a director in the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co.; and a director in the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Co.; that the said Henry W. Cannon was president and chairman of the board of directors of the Pacific Coast Co., a corporation which owned the entire capital stock of the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Co., the Pacific Coast Railway Co., the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., and various other corporations engaged in the mining of coal and in the development of agricultural and timber land in various parts of the United States; that the acceptance by the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding said office of United States district judge, of said favors from an officer and official of the said corporations, any of which in the due course of business was liable to be interested in litigation pending in the said court over which he presided as such judge, was improper and had a tendency to and did bring his said office of district judge into disrepute.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?

The Secretary will proceed to call the roll for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Availing myself of the rule, I send to the Clerk's desk my reasons for the vote I am about to cast. I vote "not guilty."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I asked to be excused from voting on certain articles, but I am not quite sure just what articles the request included. I have no desire to be excused from voting on articles 10, 11, 12, or 13.

Mr. SWANSON's name was thereupon called, and he voted "not guilty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate, 1 Senator has voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 65 Senators have voted that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article. The Senate has therefore adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article.

The reasons filed by Mr. REED for his vote on the roll call are as follows:

By Mr. REED: In my opinion, article 10 is not sustained by the evidence. It is shown that Henry W. Cannon is a relative of the wife of the respondent, and that on other occasions the respondent and his wife had been the guests of Henry W. Cannon. The relationship existing between the families affords a proper reason for the invitation referred to in the article, and its acceptance. Under these conditions it is my opinion that the action of the respondent ought to receive that construction which accords with innocence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 11.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, did, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully accept and receive a sum of money in excess of $500, which sum of money was contributed and given to the said Robert W. Archbald by various attorneys who were practitioners in the said court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald; that said money was raised by subscription and solicitation from said attorneys by two of the officers of said court, to wit, Edward R. W. Searle, clerk of said court, and J. B. Woodward, jury commissioner of said court, both the said Edward R. W. Searle and the said J. B. Woodward having been appointed to the said positions by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge aforesaid.

Wherefore said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will call the roll for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POINDEXTER (when his name was called). Under the rule, I desire to file a statement of the reasons for my vote. I vote "not guilty."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I vote "not guilty" and, under the rule, I file my reasons.

The roll call was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll, 11 Senators have voted that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 51 Senators have voted that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article. The Senate has therefore adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article.

During the roll call the following statements were filed:

By Mr. POINDEXTER: As to articles 10, 11, and 12, while I regard the acts charged therein, and partly admitted by the respondent, as reprehensible and justly subject to censure and objection, I do not regard them, standing alone, as sufficient cause for impeachment.

By Mr. REED: In explanation of my vote upon this article, I desire to state that I regard the practice sometimes indulged in by judges of courts, of accepting gifts of moneys contributed by attorneys practicing before them, as one which should not only be discountenanced but absolutely discontinued. Indeed, it is my opinion that it should be prohibited by positive statute. Nevertheless, it is my opinion that the evidence in this case does not go far enough to show that the money was contributed or accepted because of any sinister reason. Under these circumstances I do not think the act of sufficient gravity to warrant a finding of guilty. If the evidence had shown by direct testimony or by circumstances that the money was contributed for the purpose of promoting favoritism, and that it was accepted in such a manner as to create an obligation, a different case would have been presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the next article.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 12.

That on the 9th day of April, 1901, and for a long time prior thereto, one J. B. Woodward was a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a corporation and common carrier doing a general railroad business; that on said day the said Robert W. Archbald, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and while acting as such judge, did appoint the said J. B. Woodward as a jury commissioner in and for said judicial district, and the said J. B. Woodward, by virtue of said appointment and with the continued consent and approval of the said Robert W. Archbald, held such office and performed all the duties pertaining thereto during all the time that the said Robert W. Archbald held said office of United State district judge, and that during all of said time the said J. B. Woodward continued to act as a general attorney for the said Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; all of which was at all times well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will proceed to the call of the roll for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will recapitulate the responses.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate, 10 Senators have responded that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 46 Senators have responded that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article. The Senate has therefore adjudged that the respondent is not guilty as charged in this article.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the remaining article, 13, includes, in general terms, as I understand, the various articles which have preceded it and I find it exceedingly difficult to vote upon it one way or the other, because if I vote "guilty"——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator a request to make?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to make this statement, because if I am not permitted to make a certain motion I want to ask to be excused from voting. This is preliminary to asking to be excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can give his reasons for wishing to be excused.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator please speak a little louder?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say that I find myself embarrassed to vote upon this question either way—guilty or not guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not enter into an argument upon the subject. He can state his reasons.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I understand that I am stating my reasons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was giving the reason why I think I should be excused from voting, and that is that I have voted upon some of these articles "guilty" and upon some of them "not guilty," and, as it occurs to me, I can not consistently vote upon this one article one way or the other. I desire to be excused, and before that request is put I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to move to indefinitely postpone the consideration of article 13?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know that that is strictly a parliamentary question, as it is controlled by the rule of the Senate that the Senators shall vote upon it. It is a matter upon which the Chair would not take the responsibility of ruling, but will submit it to the Senate if the Senator desires it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, Mr. President, I move that the further consideration of article 13 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits to the Senate the question of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that subject to debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing open to debate under the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I want to submit this point of order to the Chair. I submit that it is the duty of the Chair to decide the point, for the simple reason that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will decide it, then, and rule the motion to be out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; because the order under which we are working forbids debate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I ask to have my request put. I ask to be excused from voting upon this article for the reasons I have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that he be excused from voting on article 13 for the reasons indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I make the same request, and for the same reasons as those given by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] makes the request that he be excused for the reasons indicated by the Senator from Utah. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. For the same reasons I ask to be excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks to be excused for reasons already given. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I ask to be excused for the same reasons as those assigned by the several Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks to be excused. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. WARREN. This article seems to be an omnium gatherum, including all the other charges, and for the same reasons expressed by the Senator from Utah I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks to be excused from voting. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. DU PONT. For the same reason which was so well stated a few moments ago by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], I ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I shall have to object to these requests. They will leave us where we will not have a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota objects.

Mr. LIPPITT. For the reason that I can not consistently with my other votes vote on this article, I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks to be excused from voting on this article. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. SIMMONS. For the reasons given by other Senators, I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina, for the reasons indicated, asks to be excused from voting. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not believe that I can consistently vote on this article, and therefore I ask to be excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks to be excused from voting on this article.

Mr. REED. If it is in order, I should like to make a motion with reference to this matter for the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is now putting the request of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. Ah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the Senator stands excused. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this presents a peculiar question, and I therefore move that the doors of the Senate be closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the doors of the Senate be closed for deliberation.

Mr. DU PONT. I renew my request, for the reason stated, that I may be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending, made by the Senator from Missouri. The motion is that the doors of the Senate shall be closed for private conference.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point that no debate is in order.

Mr. O'GORMAN. There are 13 articles on which Senators are prepared to render judgment. We have passed on 12 of those articles, and I assume that Senators will not be embarrassed in passing on the thirteenth; and that, I assume, is the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point that no debate is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule on the subject that the Chair can find.

Mr. LODGE. It is the rule of the Senate that we shall vote without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the question is on the motion to go into private conference.

Mr. LODGE. That must be voted on without debate, like everything else.

Mr. ASHURST. On the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems the Chair has ruled that it is open to debate, and I want to say only one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, on reflection, thinks the point of order made by the Senator from Massachusetts is correct. The Chair will rule that debate is not in order.

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the demand for the yeas and nays made by the Senator from Arizona on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Under the rule we have to determine all these questions by a roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not unless one-fifth of the Senators present demand it. The Senator will find that the rule is explicit on that subject.

Mr. JONES. I understood the rule did not require any second when the Senate is sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has made a point of order, and it is proper to rule on it.

Mr. REED. When I made the motion I thought it would save time. If there is no objection, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws the motion, but the Chair will state to the Senator from Washington that if he will refer to the rules he will find explicit provision that the question shall be decided without division unless the yeas and nays are demanded. The Senator from Missouri withdraws the motion for the closing of the doors, and the Secretary will read article 13.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of article 13 be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. We are, under the rule, compelled to vote on the article. It can not be withdrawn.

Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The article will be read. The article has not yet been read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE 13.

That Robert W. Archbald, on the 29th day of March, 1901, was duly appointed United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and held such office until the 31st day of January, 1911, on which last-named date he was duly appointed a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

That during the time in which the said Robert W. Archbald has acted as such United States district judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court he, the said Robert W. Archbald, at divers times and places, has sought wrongfully to obtain credit from and through certain persons who were interested in the result of suits then pending and suits that had been pending in the court over which he presided as judge of the district court, and in suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, of which the said Robert W. Archbald is a member.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being United States circuit judge and being then and there a judge of the United States Commerce Court, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and places, did undertake to carry on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase and sale of culm dumps, coal lands, and other coal properties, and for a valuable consideration to compromise litigation pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in the furtherance of his efforts to compromise such litigation and of his speculations in coal properties, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as a judge of the said United States Commerce Court to induce the officers of the Erie Railroad Co., the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co., and other railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, respectively, to enter into various and divers contracts and agreements in which he was then and there financially interested with divers persons, to wit, Edward J. Williams, John Henry Jones, Thomas H. Jones, George M. Watson, and others, without disclosing his said interest therein on the face of the contract, but which interest was well known to the officers and agents of said railroad companies.

That the said Robert W. Archbald did not invest any money or other thing of value in consideration of any interest acquired or sought to be acquired by him in securing or in attempting to secure such contracts or agreements or properties as aforesaid, but used his influence as such judge with the contracting parties thereto, and received an interest in said contracts, agreements, and properties in consideration of such influence in aiding and assisting in securing same.

That the said several railroad companies were and are engaged in interstate commerce, and at the time of the execution of the several contracts and agreements aforesaid and of entering into negotiations looking to such agreements had divers suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, and that the conduct and efforts of the said Robert W. Archbald in endeavoring to secure and in securing such contracts and agreements from said railroad companies was continuous and persistent from the said 31st day of March, 1911, to about the 15th day of April, 1912.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I take this opportunity to file my reasons.

Mr. POINDEXTER (when his name was called). Under the rule I desire to file the following statement.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will withdraw my request to be excused and will vote and will file my reasons. I vote "guilty."

Mr. DU PONT. I withdraw my request to be excused and file my reasons. I vote "not guilty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate, 42 Senators have responded that the respondent is guilty as charged in this article and 20 Senators have responded that he is not guilty as charged in this article. More than two-thirds having voted that the respondent is guilty, the Senate has adjudged that the respondent is guilty as charged in the article.

The reasons filed by Senators are as follows:

By Mr. BRANDEGEE: I vote "not guilty" on article 13 because it alleges offenses some of which are alleged to have been committed by the respondent while he was a judge of the United States district court, which office he does not hold at present and did not hold at the time the articles were adopted by the House of Representatives; and also because it is impossible to separate the offenses alleged to have been committed as district judge from those alleged to have been committed as circuit judge and because I do not think all the allegations have been proved.

By Mr. POINDEXTER: Mr. POINDEXTER stated, as to article 13, that while it includes particular acts charged in other articles it, nevertheless, charges a distinct offense, in that it charges that the respondent made a regular business for profit of such acts.

By Mr. DU PONT: Reasons filed by Senator DU PONT with respect to certain votes cast by him during this session:

My vote of "not guilty" upon the articles of impeachment against Judge R. W. Archbald numbered 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 was based, in the main, upon the fact that the offenses therein charged were alleged to have been committed prior to January 31, 1911, when he was not holding his present office. In my judgment, the legality of the impeachment, so far as such offenses are concerned, is questionable, and, in any event, a precedent fraught with danger is created.

By Mr. OWEN: Views of Mr. OWEN on articles 7, 8, 9, etc.:

Impeachment is the exercise of political power and not the exercise of mere judicial authority under a criminal code. Impeachment is the only mode of removing from office those persons proven to be unfit because of treason or high crimes or misdemeanors.

Whether these crimes be committed during the holding of a present office or a preceding office is immaterial, if such crimes demonstrate the gross unfitness of such official to hold the great offices and dignities of the people.

A wise public policy forbids the precedent to be set that promotion in office of a criminal precludes his impeachment on the ground of his discovered high crimes and misdemeanors in a previous office, from which he has just been promoted.

For these reasons, it is my judgment that articles 7, 8, 9, etc., in so far as they charge crimes committed by R. W. Archbald while United States district judge comprise impeachable offenses and may be alleged against him as judge of the Commerce Court.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer the following resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers an order, which will be read to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Before that order is presented, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES. My inquiry is whether those who asked to be excused from voting will be considered as present on the roll call? The Constitution requires that a vote of two-thirds of those present will sustain the article, and the inquiry is if the vote announced by the Chair of the number voting guilty was two-thirds of those present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no way of determining the presence of Senators except by the recorded vote.

Mr. JONES. A number of Senators were excused from this roll call, and it seems to me that they should be counted as present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no right to count anyone who has not voted.

Mr. ROOT. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] presents a resolution in the nature of an order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office and be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I move that the doors be closed for deliberation upon the sentence to be imposed by the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from New York yield to me just a moment that I may file a brief statement?

Mr. ROOT. That can be done at any time. It is not necessary that it be filed now.

Mr. WARREN. At any time within two days.

By Mr. POINDEXTER: The statement submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER is as follows: As to articles 7, 8, and 9, although the offenses charged were committed while the respondent was district judge and before he was appointed circuit judge, yet, since the penalty for impeachable offenses is not only forfeiture of office but disqualification to hold office thereafter, I am of opinion that the offenses charged in these articles, although committed before respondent's appointment as circuit judge, nevertheless disqualify him, on impeachment therefor, from holding office as such circuit judge or as judge of the Commerce Court. There is no statute of limitations nor law of limitations in impeachment proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] moves that the doors be closed in order that the Senate may deliberate in private. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

The managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent withdrew from the Chamber.

The galleries having been cleared, the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

At 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the doors were reopened.

Mr. Worthington, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin, of counsel for the respondent, appeared in the seats provided for them.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the order which I presented read, and then I shall ask for a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks that the order which he presents be read.

The Secretary read the order, as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office, and be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania desires a division of the question. The Chair will direct that the first part of the proposed order, beginning with the word "Ordered" and concluding with the word "office," be first submitted to the Senate. That portion will now be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the first portion of the proposed order, which has just been read.

The first portion of the order was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the concluding portion of the order, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the portion of the order just read by the Secretary.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. LA FOLLETTE called for the yeas and yeas.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, having been taken, resulted—yeas 39, nays 35, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the question of the adoption of the latter part of the order, which has just been read, the "yeas" are 39 and the "nays" 35. The "yeas" have it, and the latter part of the order is adopted, as well as the first, and the entire order is adopted. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the Presiding Officer shall now pronounce the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I desire that the Senate take appropriate action to communicate its judgment to the House of Representatives and the Executive Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has not yet pronounced judgment. That will be for the Senate to do.

JUDGMENT OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) thereupon pronounced the judgment of the Senate as follows:

The Senate therefore do order and decree, and it is hereby adjudged, that the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be, and he is hereby, removed from office; and that he be, and is hereby, forever disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

OPINIONS OF SENATORS FILED AND PUBLISHED BY ORDER OF THE SENATE SITTING ON THE TRIAL OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD, CIRCUIT JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT, AND DESIGNATED TO SERVE IN THE COMMERCE COURT.

OPINIONS OF SENATOR ROOT AND SENATOR LODGE.

In the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, January 13, 1913:

I have voted that the respondent is guilty under articles 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 13, because I find that he used the power and influence of his office as judge of the Court of Commerce to secure favors of money value for himself and his friends from railroad companies, some of which were litigants in his court and all of which were under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, subject to the review of the Court of Commerce.

I consider this course of conduct, and each instance of it, to be a high crime and misdemeanor.

I have voted "not guilty," upon the other articles, because, while most of them involve improper conduct, I do not consider that the acts proved are high crimes and misdemeanors.

I have no doubt that the respondent is liable to impeachment for acts done while he was a judge of the district court and that the Senate has jurisdiction to try him for such acts.

ELIHU ROOT.

I concur in the foregoing, except as to article 4, upon which I voted the respondent guilty.

H. C. LODGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. I move that the Senate, sitting in the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, do now adjourn without day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would it not be proper, before that is done, to direct that the action of the Senate be communicated to the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is for the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would then move, Mr. President, that the action of the Senate in the case of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be communicated to the House of Representatives and to the President of the United States.

The motion was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the foregoing order and judgment of the Senate and transmit a certified copy of the same to each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that the Senate sitting for the consideration of the articles of impeachment presented against Robert W. Archbald do now adjourn sine die.

The motion was agreed to.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and Mr. Worthington, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin, of counsel for the respondent, thereupon withdrew.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in legislative session.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. If we adjourn now, without the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside, will it displace the unfinished business?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not suppose the unfinished business would be affected in its status by an adjournment.

Mr. BORAH. The matter of adjournment does not affect the status of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 14, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 13, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, to renew our allegiance to Thee, to add to our spiritual strength, for we realize that the crowning glory of each man's life is character. Strengthen us that we may resist evil and make us strong to overcome temptation, that we may fulfill the obligations of this day, and keep our character free from the contamination of sin by doing all things in accordance with Thy will. Hear us, and thus bless us, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 11, 1913, was read and approved.

MEMORIAL SERVICES.

The SPEAKER. In connection with setting the date for the memorial services for the late Representative WEDEMEYER, the Chair desires to make a suggestion to the House so that Members may take it under consideration. It has always appeared to the Chair that 12 o'clock on Sunday is a very inconvenient hour at which to have these services. The suggestion of the Chair is that they be set for 2 or 3 o'clock on that day. The Chair would be glad to have the Members consider this matter among themselves.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 27148, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, has the item with relation to the pay and arrangement for substitute carriers and clerks been passed over?

The CHAIRMAN. That was passed over, to be called up at the suggestion of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by star routes in Alaska, $450,000: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 7, after the word "stations," insert the words "and the transportation of mail by aeroplane or other air craft."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee reserve his point of order for a few minutes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order for five minutes.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that the chairman of this important committee will not insist upon his point of order. Nearly a year ago, when this same committee reported out its bill for appropriations to take care of the post-office service, I offered an amendment appropriating $50,000 for carrying mail by aeroplane or other air craft. There was no point of order made at that time, which, of course, while it serves no precedent, still called for an extra appropriation.

At the present time, and in this amendment which I offer, there is no money called for, and the language of the provision itself leaves a large amount of discretion and latitude with the Postmaster General, because it covers, as it plainly recites, cases of emergency. I took this matter up the other day with the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Stewart, and I asked him why he had not presented this phase of the subject at the hearings at this time. He said he had met with such discouragement before that he thought it was out of the question to get any extra appropriation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it better that all of these aeroplane projects be left to the War and Navy Departments rather than to the Post Office Department?

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to answer that question. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, because having given no little thought to this whole subject myself, I wish to say that one difficulty that has confronted the development of aerial navigation in the United States, as far as the Government patronage is concerned, has been due to the fact that we have fortunately no war upon us, and we have for that purpose no present existing urgent need of the adoption of this kind of defense; but we have every day in the year an opportunity for testing this new method of carrying mail, especially with the inauguration of the parcel post. I wish to impress—and I want to use such earnestness as lies in my power—upon this House the opportunity which it now has of beginning. I will not say experiments, because the matter has passed beyond experiments, but beginning a transportation system that will revolutionize and work wonders in this country in the next few years if we can obtain Government recognition and patronage.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHARP. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the gentleman's idea that this will facilitate the transportation of first-class mail or parcel post?

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for that question, and I will ask the indulgence of the House, if my time expires, for a few moments in which to read some extracts from an article bearing upon this subject to the House. In the hearings upon this question of general transportation of mail in Alaska, either by water or by rail, the Second Assistant Postmaster General said that there is an accumulation of about 25,000 pounds of mail that lasts through the winter, because it has been impossible to transport that mail through the winter months.

Mr. FOSTER. Has any experiments been made in aerial navigation in the cold climate of Alaska?

Mr. SHARP. Not in Alaska, but they have repeatedly in the Alps and Pyrenees and over other high altitudes, and I only wish I had not been pledged to secrecy and could tell the details of the wonderful experiments which have been made within the last 18 hours over our broad Potomac, right here at our doors, where at a height at times of 80 feet a hydroplane traveled 70 miles an hour. These birdmen are doing it under our very eyes. They carried the mail down the Mississippi River, a distance of 400 miles, last year, and I wish I might have time to read an extract from what one of the experts has said upon the use of the hydroplanes, which he contributes to the National Waterways in the November issue.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not think that hydroplanes would be very useful in Alaska?

Mr. SHARP. That is the place preeminently above all others where they would be useful. They can traverse the Yukon River and traverse it whether frozen or not. Nine out of ten of the populous towns in Alaska are upon the rivers. May I take the time briefly to read from the remarks to which I refer?

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that there are many places in Alaska where it is desirable to deliver the mail, where it could be delivered in this way at little expense, and where under the ordinary method it could not be delivered during several months in the year?

Mr. SHARP. There is no question about it at all. Mr. Jerome Fanciulli, in his essay on "A New Use for Waterways," uses this language:

> It has been through the construction of the hydroaeroplane, however, that the field for marine aviation has really opened up. Robinson's flight down the Mississippi River from Minneapolis to Rock Island, a distance of nearly 400 miles, demonstrated the practicability of the marine aeroplane. On this occasion the aviator delivered and received mail at the various important towns along the river. Traveling at a speed that averaged over 70 miles an hour, the hydroaeroplane on that occasion demonstrated in a very practical manner a new use to which the waterways of the country will be put.

This gentleman is vice president of the Curtiss Aeroplane Co., which makes hundreds of test flights a year. He says further:

> To my mind this carrying of the mails offers the most practical application of the marine flying craft in its present stage of development. Many places situated on watercourses suffer serious loss through poor railroad service. This means poor mail service, which is detrimental to any community.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have a short time in which to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I have no objection to his talking, but I shall insist upon the point of order, for the simple reason that we are having very great difficulty now in handling this mail matter on land and water, and I am hardly able to consent to getting into the air with it.

Mr. SHARP. My idea is to get rid of these difficulties.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think we ought to take up this matter without consideration by the committee.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Fanciulli says further:

> Aeroplane manufacturers can now build machines that can carry nearly a ton of weight for long distances at a speed of 60 miles an hour. Aerial mail delivery service with such machines on those waterways reaching towns that have little or no railroad service would be of incalculable value.
> Aerial mail service along watercourses would afford the fastest transportation of the mail at a minimum expense. A route 200 miles long could be covered twice a day with a thousand pounds of mail matter at a total annual expense of $18,000, including the cost of equipment. These machines, used for aerial mail service, could do a double duty in that the operators could discover breaks in the river banks during high-water periods.
